I am frank to say to the committee that on first examining this project I did not think favorably of it, but I gave it a good deal of consideration. The committee called before them the engineer having the improvement in charge, and it seemed to us that an expenditure of this amount was justified. The river is easily capable of improvement. It has stable banks, and the construction of locks and dams is a comparatively easy problem. There is a great amount of traffic in prospect, both from the source to the mouth and from the mouth toward the source. In this particular it differs from many other rivers, where the bulk of the traffic must necessarily be one way. Great quantities of cotton and grain will be carried toward the mouth, and from the mouth toward the source timber and building material for the large expanse of prairie tributary to Dallas toward the north.

We have also made a provision of $360,000 and an authorization of $400,000 for the improvement of the Black Warrior, Warrior, and Tombigbee rivers. This project has been under way for a long time. It affords great possibilities in the way of carrying supplies of coal from above Tuscaloosa to Mobile and the Gulf, where coal must be obtained by shipment for a long distance. It also affords the possibility of carrying, at cheaper rates, iron from Birmingham, which has already become an important factor in the export trade of the United States.

We have also made provisions for four locks on the Ohio River. The improvement of this river is different from that of those I have mentioned. The object of the locks and dams is merely to provide a uniform stage of the water so that it shall not fall below 6 feet in depth and prevent the river from going out of use at low stages. In the other rivers it is necessary to overcome obstacles afforded by shoals and rapids.

The third question which will, in part, determine whether the appropriations carried in this bill shall be increased or decreased will arise from the policy as to confining this bill to navigation proper. Very large amounts have been appropriated in past years for what is called rectification of banks. If the uniform policy is adopted of protecting the banks of alluvial streams against erosion, in time these amounts, if we pursue a logical policy, will come almost to equal those made for the legitimate improvement of rivers and harbors.

Another feature of this appropriation has been that they have largely been expended at places where there is little or no navigation. Without intending to call invidious attention to any locality, I will mention that portion of the Upper Missouri River for a few miles above and below Bismarck and Mandan, in North Dakota. There is a project there for rectification of banks at an expense of nearly $750,000, about $145 for each inhabitant of the two towns. The total navigation for a stretch of 1,600 miles, from Sioux City to Fort Benton, is a little over 20,000 tons. The committee desired to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole and of the House to this incongruity in appropriations, and desire a full discussion of the subject, whether upon this bill shall be carried appropriations for rectification and protection of the banks of alluvial streams where practically no navigation exists.

There has also been an effort in recent years to place upon this bill appropriations for utilization of so-called arid lands. Two years ago an amendment was placed upon this bill appropriating $250,000, I believe, for the construction of reservoirs in the upper waters of the Missouri River, more than 9,000 feet above the level of the sea, remote by hundreds of miles from any navigation or use of any boat, unless it be a birch canoe.

Members of the House are familiar with the fact that this body stood for the exclusion of that item, and before the bill became a law it was excluded.

A fourth question arises, the decision of which will have its influence upon the future amount of these appropriations, namely, the fixing of a proper boundary line between improvements to be made by the Federal Government and those to be made by municipalities or private parties. An examination of the projects submitted to us shows that if we seek for a uniform rule in this regard we shall find only hopeless confusion. In many cases the General Government has carried its improvements merely to the mouth of the harbor, while in others this improvement has been carried to the wharves and up small streams tributary. On the Great Lakes there is a good illustration, where most of their harbors are afforded by rivers flowing into the lake. In the great majority of them the whole improvement of the harbors on the rivers where boats reach the wharves has been undertaken by municipalities and private parties. In a few, however, the General Government has gone inside of these harbors and done dredging and made improvements which in the other places are made by the municipalities.

While not attempting to enforce any hard-and-fast rule, the committee have sought to make one which shall create some boundary line between the municipalities and the General Government. We have tried, however, to judge each case according to its merit. In some cases there is no opportunity for an outer harbor, and there must be an improvement of the inner harbor. In that case it makes a strong showing for an appropriation within, which otherwise would not exist.

A criticism has been made on this bill, of which I speak with some hesitancy, because my own interest has been identified with that locality ever since I first came to Congress. The statement has been made that undue proportion of the amounts in this bill is appropriated for the Great Lakes. On examination of the subject this criticism will be found to be utterly without foundation. It may be a surprise to some of you to know that 4 of the 8 ports in this country having the largest tonnage are located on the Great Lakes. I must concede some lack of confidence in the official statistics available, owing to the fact that at the ocean-going ports the actual tonnage reported by the collector of customs is restricted to foreign-going vessels, while other statistics are furnished by boards of trade and commercial bodies.

In the statistics before us I fear that injustice may be done to the city of Boston, the figures concerning which are not satisfactory as presented to us. It should be said in this connection that at any rate, whether its tonnage be large or small, it is of a very valuable quality, and that in the sum total of the value of its exports and imports it is second only to New York City. It should also be stated that there are other tests of the importance of improving a port besides its tonnage, namely, the value of the exports and imports, the necessity of precautions to save human life, the existence of rival ports which could carry merchandise as well as the one improved, or the possession of an exclusive field by the one which asks appropriations.

But after making all these concessions it still remains true that tonnage is the most important test, because it determines the number of boats entering a harbor, the probable size and draft of those frequenting it, and the dangers from collision arising from large traffic.

The eight largest ports in the country, as given by the official statistics contained in the reports of the Chief of Engineers, are, in their order, New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, Buffalo, Pittsburg, which, perhaps, you can hardly call a port, being located on the head waters of the Ohio; Baltimore, Cleveland, and Duluth-Superior. It thus appears that four of these ports are located upon the Great Lakes.

There is another fact: On the exterior coast of the United States there are numerous bays affording ample space for anchorage within, and there are numerous good-sized rivers flowing into the sea, up which there is ample space for wharves. With three exceptions, upon the Great Lakes these facilities are lacking. These three exceptions are in the harbor of Duluth-Superior, where there are two magnificent inner bays, the harbor of Erie, in which a large bay or interior body of water is nearly surrounded by a long and curving peninsula, and the harbor of Sandusky, Ohio, which is within Sandusky Bay.

In this last harbor, however, the benefits obtained by the protection of headlands are neutralized by the low draft which can be carried to the wharves, or by the shallow depths of water. But in most localities on the lakes it is necessary to create a harbor on what is nearly a straight stretch of the shore. It is obtained either by utilizing a small river or creek which runs into the lake or by building breakwaters on the outside. These differences which I have pointed out emphasize the necessity for more ample provisions for harbors upon the lakes.

Now, let us take up the channels on the lakes and see if there is anything that looks like discrimination there. The distinctive feature of the Great Lake traffic is that the difficulty in navigation between terminal points is in the connecting waters. The lakes themselves for the most part have a depth and size as ample as that afforded by the ocean itself; but in the connecting waters between Lakes Superior and Huron, between Lakes Huron and Erie, through the two rivers, St. Clair and Detroit, and Lake St. Clair there are serious obstacles. There is an almost insuperable barrier between Lake Erie and Lake Ontario.

Now, let us make a few comparisons. We have provided for a channel 2,000 feet wide from New York Harbor to the sea. We are making provision in this bill for the prosecution of a project for channels respectively 1,200 and 1,500 feet wide from Boston to the sea, but in the Hay Lake Channel, between Superior and Huron, the channel is only 300 feet wide. In the Detroit River, in the lower portion, the channel is only 440 feet wide. This, however, is only part of the facts. In the last two channels mentioned boats must turn at sharp angles, guided by range lights and marks, which in thick or dark weather are very hard to descry.

In the single season of 1899, by collisions and groundings in the Hay Lake Channel, a direct damage was incurred amounting to $370,118, according to an official report contained in Senate Document No. 80, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session. And the engineers who made the report stated that $675,000 would be a conservative estimate, taking into account consequential damages in the way of delays and damage to other vessels. So I submit to the committee and to the House that by increasing this channel by providing an alternative one 300 feet up as well as 300 feet down, by widening the Detroit River Channel to 600 feet and by improving the harbors on the lakes, we do not furnish any ground for the criticism that the Great Lakes receive undue attention in this bill. In the connecting waters between Lake Superior and Lake Huron there is a larger traffic than that which goes in and out of any harbor in the country. In the Detroit River there is a still larger traffic, greater than that which goes through any other river in the world.

Mr. Chairman, I have detained the House much longer than I had anticipated. There are, however, several features of this bill of which I wish to speak somewhat further. On full consideration by the committee, it did not seem best to continue the Missouri River Commission or the large appropriations made for that stream. The report gives some comparisons which I should like to have each member of the committee read, showing that we have expended nearly $11,000,000 on this stream with very trivial development of navigation. The navigation is less than it was thirty years ago, when only small amounts were appropriated.

The question arises, would it not be better for the navigation of the stream if we went back to the former policy of small appropriations? These large amounts have been largely diverted, as I have said, to the rectification of banks. We mean no reflection on the Missouri River Commission. It is no doubt made up of men of ability and integrity, but they are proceeding on a plan under which it would cost $30,000,000 to improve this river in the single part between its mouth and Kansas City. So long as there are other streams where improvements can be made much more economically and profitably, we do not feel justified in recommending to the House that these large appropriations should continue.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman a question in connection with the Missouri River.

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The committee practically declares that no more money shall be appropriated for the preservation of the banks of the Missouri, and practically abandons the river. Now, the question I want to ask is this: Will the chairman of the committee or the committee itself antagonize an amendment which will permit the riparian owners on the Missouri River to construct dikes or wing dams or whatever is necessary at their own expense to protect their own lands?

Mr. BURTON. Speaking for myself, I should say not for an instant.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, I will take great pleasure in offering that amendment.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Provided they are approved by the Secretary of War.

Mr. BURTON. Of course there must be some regard to the effect on the navigation of the river.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And subject to the approval of the engineers.

Mr. BURTON. With that reservation, I do not think there would be any objection on the part of any member of the committee.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. My district straddles the Missouri. Several times the owners of very rich lands on the banks of the river have undertaken to build some kind of a thing out in the river—a dike, or whatever you call it—to protect their lands, and were perfectly willing to pay for it, but every time they did it the Engineer Department jumped them, because it was interfering with the navigation of the river. If there is no navigation, they ought to be allowed to protect their own lands.

Mr. BURTON. I want to say to the gentleman that I believe that plan would be altogether better for the people on the Missouri River than the plan we have pursued. I believe they could judge more judiciously of what is needed and that the expenditure would not be wasted. If you leave this matter to be determined by private interests, no one is going to throw money away or act under favoritism. It is going to be expended where it will do good.

Now, I want to say, further, that in order to do complete justice to that locality we have recommended in our bill $300,000 for the portion of the river below Sioux City and $40,000 above. Possibly our action might have had more character, I may say, if we had stricken out those appropriations entirely, in view of the statement made in the report and our opinion in regard to the matter; but we did not wish to discriminate against that locality and wanted to make provision for finishing works in progress, so that they may not entirely be neglected, and for all legitimate claims of navigation upon the river.

Mr. HEPBURN. If the gentleman will yield to me, I should like to ask him if he does not understand that the appropriation, as it is made, could be used for the very purpose suggested by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]?

Mr. BURTON. The wording of the bill is in this language:

> Improving Missouri River below Sioux City: Continuing improvement, $300,000, which shall be expended in the improvement of such portions of said river as the Secretary of War may designate; and such portions of said appropriation as he may deem necessary may be expended for the improvement of tributary streams of said river heretofore under improvement under the direction of the Missouri River Commission.

Now, that leaves it in the discretion of the Secretary of War. It is expected, however, that this amount will be confined to improvements that bear with some directness on increase of navigation or facilities for navigation. Now, there may be a dike partly under way where to complete it would result in serious damage. We desire to leave with the Secretary of War a large measure of discretion with reference to that; but I have no hesitation in saying to the gentleman from Iowa that the idea the committee had in mind was ultimately to restrict these appropriations absolutely to improvements of navigation. I think I should say that in frankness to the gentleman and to the House.

Mr. HEPBURN. Would you consent to an amendment that would give to the Secretary of War jurisdiction to use this appropriation for the purpose of confining the river within its present limits, for instance?

Mr. BURTON. I should hesitate about that, because I would regard that policy as impracticable. This is a very long stream. To confine it within its present limits is a stupendous proposition.

Mr. HEPBURN. Of course that could not be done through its entire length; but it might be done so far as the appropriation would go.

Mr. BURTON. The trouble about that is that it would repeat the erroneous policy which it seems to me has already been pursued. That policy has been to limit the improvements in a given case to a stretch of 40, 30, or 20 miles—taking, for instance, Jefferson City, and making an improvement there on the theory that the whole river, at an expense of tens of millions of dollars, is going to be improved in the same way. That has been the vital error in the course thus far pursued. While I do not undertake to answer the gentleman's question offhand, I should fear that his suggestion would lead to results in the same direction.

Mr. HEPBURN. Of course the expenditure would have to be confined to a certain locality—to some given point; and there might be different points at great distances apart.

Mr. BURTON. One trouble about that is the scramble—for that is the right word—for appropriations in different localities along the river. Contests would arise between different locations as to where the money should be expended; and this amount, $300,000, is notoriously inadequate to accomplish any general results in the way of confining the river within its present limits. I should think it would be better to leave absolute discretion in this matter with the Secretary of War.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Has the committee made any calculation as to the amount of money which will be saved by the policy which they now advocate, of dispensing with the Missouri River Commission?

Mr. BURTON. In salaries, not a very large amount, but in the abandonment of a policy which we think erroneous, a very considerable sum.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. As I understand, the members of the Missouri River Commission are also members of the Mississippi River Commission.

Mr. BURTON. That is not the case.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Most of them are.

Mr. BURTON. Some of them.

Mr. CATCHINGS. The commissions are separate.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Even under the policy which the gentleman advocates, it would be necessary to have offices somewhere, to employ clerks, etc., and in my judgment you would save absolutely nothing by abolishing the commission. The officers now engaged are gentlemen who have devoted many years to this work and who consequently are better posted than any new engineers who might be put in charge of it.

Mr. BURTON. It did not seem best to the committee to continue the bureau unless the bureau has something to do. We saw no need for officials unless certain duties are assigned to them. But I would say further that these subordinates of the commission who are no doubt competent would, if fit for their places, be very likely to be employed by the Engineer Department when it assumes control. As to the military officers—the engineers—their positions are of course secure. They will merely be assigned to some other work, or possibly this same work. I should not be at all surprised if Colonel Stickney would be continued on the Missouri River. He no doubt understands it better than anybody else. I have no criticism of him to make, but only of the line of policy that has been pursued. Perhaps you may say that Congress has been at fault in making appropriations for continuing classes of improvements which have been enormously expensive and have brought no good.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. My point is that if what the chairman of the committee says be true, you do not save any money by abolishing the commission.

Mr. BURTON. But it certainly would be a very peculiar policy to deprive those officers of anything to do and yet continue them as officials. That, it seems to me, would certainly not commend itself to the House or be justified by sound principles of economy or business.

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. At the last session of this Congress a law was passed providing for a survey and estimates of cost for constructing a system of canals and lakes at The Dalles, Oregon, and at Celilo Falls, Washington. Some years prior to that Congress passed a law providing for the construction of a boat railway at The Dalles and appropriated a large amount of money for that purpose, of which there is yet available some $220,000.

I notice by section 7 of this bill you repeal that item entirely. That is the bulk of your repealing clause. I believe the total is about $270,000, and $220,000 of that is for the boat railway at The Dalles. Now, this Congress at the last session authorized the survey for making another improvement, an improvement looking to the construction of a canal and locks, and that survey has been made and the report submitted to your committee. It seems to me that it is not right to pass this bill making this repeal and ignoring the improvement contemplated in this report. It leaves this improvement between heaven and earth, and I would like to know something about it.

Mr. BURTON. I would state to the gentleman that the same repealing clause was contained in the river and harbor bill as it passed the last House, but it was stricken out in the Senate. There was some little discussion about the matter. The committee thought this boat railway—the idea of taking a boat out of the water and carrying it 8 miles on a track or tracks 40 or 50 feet wide, and to put it down in the water on a level 82 feet lower—was much more worthy of Jules Verne than of a sober engineer's report. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. But Congress had already authorized it.

Mr. BURTON. It is true that Congress had authorized it, but I trust the gentleman, while I do not wish to criticise, will not hold this present committee responsible for some things that have heretofore been authorized by Congress. Now, as to the repeal covering this appropriation into the Treasury, it is true other improvements are contemplated there, but it did not seem to the committee that this amount—something over $200,000—should be held as a leverage for another improvement. We felt that any other project ought to come up as an independent question. When we come to that we will settle the question of recommending a portage railroad or canal, and try to do justice to all parties.

We found this amount of money remaining, and it is dribbling away a few thousands a year, and we did not think it a business proposition to leave that there so that an amendment might be put on that would commit us to a larger project. It is true that a report was made, and I will say that it is a splendid thing on paper. It was granted a quasi approval of some very eminent engineers, perhaps the full approval of several of them. But we, on full consideration, did not think the boat railway a good or an economical method for the improvement of the navigation of the Columbia.

Mr. HEPBURN. I think the gentleman has before him page 75 of the bill. Would you consent to an amendment by inserting after the word "river," in line 20, the words "and in maintaining the stability of its banks," so that it shall read "which shall be expended for the improvement of such portions of said river and in maintaining the stability of its banks as the Secretary of War may designate?" That would put it entirely in the discretion of the Secretary and remove all the difficulties that the gentleman suggested.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I could not consent to that amendment. It is only a continuation of the method of expenditure there which I think we ought to abandon as rapidly as possible.

Mr. HEPBURN. That is all for the improvement of the river.

Mr. BURTON. There is a little navigation, in addition to a considerable quantity of sand, thirty or forty thousand tons, I believe, and possibilities of future improvement. Now, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I notice that the appropriation for the Tennessee from Riverton to the mouth is only $25,000. I would ask the chairman why it is not larger?

Mr. BURTON. I would say to the gentleman that the last bill carried an amount for this purpose, which is the improvement of the Tennessee from Riverton to the mouth, the portion comparatively on a level and easily susceptible of improvement, of which there was still available on the 30th of November $33,000, and there was $29,000 remaining at the end of the month of December. The committee thought that the $29,000 remaining, with the $25,000 appropriated, would be sufficient to prosecute the work there with a reasonable degree of vigor. I think my friend will find his constituents satisfied. Now I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. I desire to ask a question in relation to this part of the bill. It seems that the bill provides for an appropriation of $40,000 above Sioux City and $300,000 below Sioux City. Now, heretofore a considerable appropriation has been made for the improvement of the banks and wharves at Sioux City, and these improvements are in progress. They are not yet completed, and it seems that this bill excludes anything from being expended at Sioux City.

Mr. BURTON. I would not think so; the dividing line is at Sioux City. It is a mere matter of phraseology. A question has been raised as to the work done above and below Sioux City. I am informed that there has been a ruling by the Attorney-General which seems to create some doubt, and I would be willing for the gentleman to offer an amendment when we reach that part of the bill.

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. The appropriations in the river and harbor bill carries an appropriation of $70,000 above Sioux City. The Secretary of War in making the allotment allotted $30,000 to be expended at Sioux City. Objections were made to that allotment, and the question has been submitted to the Attorney-General, and he held——

Mr. BURTON. I am perfectly willing to have any phraseology you name there to cure the ambiguity, if it is an ambiguity.

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. I would just make the statement now. At and below Sioux City——

Mr. BURTON. The gentleman can call attention to that when we reach it in the consideration of the bill. Now I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DALZELL. I notice a matter for the improvement of the Allegheny River. I will ask the gentleman whether that has relation to the improvements already under way or in contemplation.

Mr. BURTON. It pertains to the general improvement of the Allegheny River. There is an item of $244,000, I think it is, which will be carried in the sundry civil bill for building locks and dams there——

Mr. DALZELL. In addition to those appropriated for?

Mr. BURTON. No; to be expended on those heretofore authorized.

Mr. DALZELL. There is no appropriation for providing additional locks and dams?

Mr. BURTON. No, we had so many locks and dams in that neighborhood to provide for that we felt we had gone to the limit of what we could do. I want to say to the gentleman further, although I do not want to say anything which shall have the semblance of a promise for the future, that we regard that improvement of the Allegheny as of importance, and that it will undoubtedly have consideration.

Mr. DALZELL. One other question. I notice an appropriation here for the purchase of land and locks where necessary on the Monongahela River. I would like to know whether that is land adjoining the locks 1 and 2?

Mr. BURTON. It is. This is the fact: boats come up, sometimes in great numbers—the gentleman probably is more familiar with it than I am—and in waiting to be locked through they have to rest against the side of the banks. Private owners own the banks along where they happen to anchor and charge them a fee for it, and in order that there might be ample room for them to moor while waiting to be locked through, this provision was inserted in the bill.

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee why there was no action taken by the committee on Captain Hart's report for a system of locks at The Dalles?

Mr. BURTON. The gentleman from Idaho asks why there was no action taken by the committee on Captain Hart's report for a system of locks at The Dalles. I will say that it would cost $4,000,000. I say candidly to the gentleman that if we had done that, together with other improvements between the mouth of the Columbia River, where we authorized $2,000,000, it would have been only proper to change the title of this bill to this: "A bill for the development of the Columbia River." We can not take up a project in one part of the country and give it standing in a class to which it does not belong to the detriment of others.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio be allowed to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from Ohio be allowed to conclude his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question. I have been urging this committee to make an appropriation for a beautiful stream that flows through the district I have the honor to represent.

Mr. BURTON. The Elk River?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes. I do not find any appropriation in this bill for that purpose, and I would like to inquire why the committee did not deem it wise to give us some relief.

Mr. BURTON. I want to say to the gentleman that it would have afforded us the utmost pleasure to accommodate the gentleman from Tennessee. We recognize his long service in this House, and that while he has not heretofore asked the committee for river and harbor appropriations, he has repeatedly urged us to do something for the Elk River. But the fact is that here is a project for improvement costing $880,000, the whole of which must be expended or it will do no good. As remarked to me by an engineer who is familiar with the locality, when this country becomes as thickly populated as Holland, and like that country furnished with numerous canals and other improvements, it would seem fit to improve the Elk River at this expense of nearly $900,000.

But I think we ought to advance a few stages in population before that improvement would be justifiable. We have inserted a provision, I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee, providing for a survey up to Estill Springs. The fact is the Elk River has this characteristic—that it goes down hill—and that is true of it in a more marked degree than it is of a great many other streams. It goes down rather rapidly, and it would be necessary to improve it by locks and dams at rather short intervals, in order to utilize it for navigation.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The gentleman is satisfied that it flows through a great country?

Mr. BURTON. Oh, no doubt about that.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. And that there is considerable commerce on its banks?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; and no doubt commerce would be stimulated if these improvements are made. I think, however, that it would afford a simple solution of the question and would be more economical for the Government to build a railroad paralleling it. [Laughter.]

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question. On page 70, line 10, the following item appears: "Reservoirs at the head waters of the Mississippi River, continuing improvement $300,000." Will the gentleman explain about that?

Mr. BURTON. These reservoirs are a legacy from a preceding Congress. I speak only for myself, but if that question was to arise to-day I do not think we would recommend that item. There were several reservoirs located up there with the idea that they would affect the water on the Upper Mississippi. They were built at great expense, and they are out of repair. They are in danger of going to pieces and submerging the surrounding country. It is probable that they do raise the water at Minneapolis a little. The question is whether an appropriation is justifiable. This amount is justifiable because it is necessary to put them in condition, so that they may not be dangerous to the surrounding property.

Mr, NEWLANDS. Was the appropriation originally intended to promote navigation or utilize the power on that river?

Mr. BURTON. I do not know. I was not a member at the time it was originally projected and placed in the bill, but I understand it was alleged that it would aid navigation. The gentleman himself is familiar with the fact that there are a great many men in the country, including some engineers, who have an idea that the building of a reservoir well toward the North Pole will affect the level of water even on the Lower Mississippi. It is probable that their views at some time have prevailed with Congress and induced the insertion of items which I think would be more carefully considered now. [Laughter.]

Mr. NEWLANDS. One further question. I understand that the River and Harbor Committee has refused to insert in this bill any provision relating to the improvement of rivers in the arid regions for the purpose of meeting the demands of irrigation as contradistinguished from navigation. Do I understand that to be the case?

Mr. BURTON. The committee has taken this stand: That we ought to confine our improvements to navigation—to rivers and harbors; that the providing of irrigation for arid lands is a widely distinct problem with which we ought to have nothing to do. In the first place, it opens up a subject as broad almost as the improvement of the rivers and harbors of the country, and in the second place it would put something on this bill which we do not think belongs to it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The gentleman will recognize the fact that the rules provide that all bills relating to the improvement of rivers are to go to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. Is not that true?

Mr. BURTON. If there is no rule that our appropriations shall be restricted to navigation, we thought it right to make one of our own.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then it is a rule made by the committee, not by the House?

Mr. BURTON. We do not understand the rule of the House as meaning that we as a committee are to have jurisdiction of water all through the country. We understand the intent of the rule to accord with our interpretation of it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The title of this bill is "A bill making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other improvements."

Mr. BURTON. "For other purposes."

Mr. NEWLANDS. Now, I ask whether an improvement to promote the use of water for irrigation would not come within that bill under its title?

Mr. BURTON. I do not think it would.

Mr. SHAFROTH rose.

Mr. BURTON. I yield to the other gentleman [Mr. SHAFROTH] interested in arid lands.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Has not the committee on previous occasions allowed an appropriation for the construction of a dam in Minnesota?

Mr. BURTON. What dam does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. SHAFROTH. One at the mouth of the Mississippi somewhere. I do not know exactly. Was there not such an item in the appropriation bill of last year?

Mr. BURTON. That was in pursuance of the plan in regard to which a question has already been asked.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I notice there is no appropriation in this bill for the project entitled "The improvement of Grays Harbor and Chehalis River."

Mr. BURTON. That is carried on the sundry civil bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is at the bar entrance. But this project might be said to be divided into three projects. One is at the bar entrance, which is now under continuing contract; then there is the improvement of the inner harbor, which is called the improvement of Grays Harbor and Chehalis River; and there is the project for the improvement of Chehalis River. Under the act of 1892, $50,000, and under the act of 1894, $25,000 was appropriated for this improvement; and in the annual report for 1896 the engineers state that unless the appropriation be made for the improvement of this inner harbor, the value of the improvement of the outer harbor will be very largely diminished. The difficulty is that the harbor next to the outer bar entrance is separated from the inner harbor by two shoals or dams, one below the town of Hoquiam and the other above the town of Aberdeen.

Mr. BURTON. I prefer that the gentleman should raise that point after we come to the debate under the five-minute rule. But I will say to him now, briefly, that it would seem to be the best policy to finish the main improvements first. I am occupying now more time than I had intended, and I would prefer that all questions that may be addressed to me should be limited hereafter to matters of general policy.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Just one further question. The engineer also reports that in order to maintain the improvements already made at the inner harbor there ought to be an appropriation of $18,500. I called that matter to the attention of the committee. Was it considered?

Mr. BURTON. It was briefly considered.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will endeavor to bring this matter up under the five-minute rule.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I would like to ask whether in the framing of this bill the committee has endeavored to make always appropriations where the Engineer Department has made a recommendation.

Mr. BURTON. The committee has pursued no rule about that. On the one hand we have avoided being mere clerks to write down the recommendations of the Engineer Department, and on the other hand we have endeavored to give careful and close attention to their reports. We have pursued no hard-and-fast rule about that matter; we could not do so; it would have been out of the question. We have omitted a great many where the engineers made recommendations. If we had put them all in it would have been necessary to bring in a bill for at least $120,000,000.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Have you not also put in somewhere there was no recommendation from the engineers?

Mr. BURTON. No, we have not; certainly not within my knowledge.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Was there a recommendation from the Chief of Engineers in reference to your own improvement at Cleveland?

Mr. BURTON. Most certainly, and a very elaborate one.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Was that an estimate or was it a recommendation?

Mr. BURTON. It was both a recommendation and an estimate.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I differ with the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. The gentleman in his figures a few moments ago, in giving the eight cities having the largest tonnage in the United States, did not include Boston.

Mr. BURTON. I stated, I believe, that I was fearful of doing Boston an injustice in that respect. I gave the figures as given in the Engineers' Report, and I will say to the gentleman that for fear I have made them inaccurate I have written to Boston, and, I believe, have telegraphed, asking them to furnish the figures if possible.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. The reason I ask the question is that we supposed that Boston was the second port in the country, and we believe it to be so.

Mr. BURTON. I will agree to anything the gentleman says as to the importance of the port of Boston. [Laughter.] I want to say to the gentleman that the claim has frequently been made before us on behalf of four ports that each is next to New York, namely, Philadelphia, Boston, Baltimore, and New Orleans. As a diversion I once prepared some figures showing that in some important particular each was second to New York, and I will be glad to give the figures to the gentleman. [Laughter.]

Mr. RIDGELY. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield for a question?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. RIDGELY. My question is intended to have a bearing on the general policy of this committee, and I will preface it by saying that we all in Kansas, so long as we have to depend upon competition in freight rates, are materially interested in maintaining some degree of navigation on the Missouri River as well as the Arkansas. Now, in the preservation of the banks from erosion we contend that you preserve and assist the navigation of the rivers. Does not the committee recognize the fact that if you protect the river banks from erosion you are preserving and aiding the navigation of the river?

Mr. BURTON. That is, if there is any navigation on it, and if the cost is commensurate with the benefits. Of course you can not answer that question by yes or no. Undoubtedly the erosion of banks is a proper subject for expenditure where it prevents cut-offs, prevents the stream from going off somewhere, so that the channel which has been previously followed will be dry. It is proper, I think, to protect landings where there is considerable traffic, but to go in and protect banks against erosion merely because they are on a stream, even if it is a navigable stream, is opening up a field that is limitless.

I will say to the gentleman that ever since I have been a member of the bar I have had charge as trustee of a piece of land containing 45 acres on a navigable river. Almost every year the storms make a change of an acre or two in the ownership on the two sides of the stream. I should not think of coming to Congress to ask an appropriation so that these banks might be rectified. We should regard that as a matter for private expense, although the stream is a navigable one and the land very valuable.

Mr. RIDGELY. Certainly not, but as a general policy. I am not interested in the immediate property on the banks of any of these streams, but I am interested in preserving the navigation so long as we have to depend on competition for our freight rates.

Mr. BURTON. The gentleman will find that carrying the principle that he advocates to its logical conclusion will go away beyond and outside of anything that has the remotest effect on freight rates.

Mr. RIDGELY. But we are alarmed at the attitude of the committee, because you clearly indicate that you are going to abandon these rivers, so far as being worthy of Government appropriation and improvement is concerned.

Mr. BURTON. I do not think the gentleman quite understands our recommendation. We have appropriated an amount which we regarded as ample for navigation.

Mr. RIDGELY. Yes, but you abolish the Missouri River Commission, and in your remarks you cite particularly the small tonnage of freight upon these streams, and say it is a question as to how far the Government should go, and clearly indicate, as I take the tone of your remarks and the tone of your committee report, that you as a committee are looking to the abandonment of those two streams, so far as Government appropriations are concerned.

Mr. BURTON. Not as far as improvements to navigation are concerned.

Mr. RIDGELY. I am glad to have that assurance.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I heard the gentleman from Tennessee ask you a question about Elk River, and I want to ask you a question now about something which is below the mouth of Elk River, namely, Colbert Shoals. It is found in lines 12, 13, and 14 of page 59 of the bill:

> And the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to prepare an estimate of cost of improving said river at the Colbert Shoals by locks and dams.

Mr. BURTON. What is the question?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Are you willing to allow an amendment to your bill based upon an accurate estimate of the cost of locks and dams by the chief engineer in charge of the Tennessee River, on the 2d day of August, 1899?

Mr. BURTON. We could not do that, because, in the first place, it is not officially before us.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Now, is it not a fact that if the Secretary of War has prepared an estimate for locks and dams at Colbert Shoals, in preference to the lateral canal plan, that you would be in favor of a generous and liberal appropriation for the removal of obstacles at Colbert Shoals?

Mr. BURTON. I could not go as far as that. Speaking for myself, and I think for the committee, I am unwilling to embark on an improvement that will cost $6,000,000.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. One further question. I want to vote for the river and harbor bill and I intend to vote for it. That is my purpose. But is it not a fact that there was an elaborate and an accurate estimate of the lock and dam system in preference to the lateral canal system at Colbert Shoals, made by a competent, certified engineer on the 2d of August, 1899, and was not that before the committee?

Mr. BURTON. There may have been some such estimate made, but it has never come before us officially. We can not take into account reports that are lodged in the engineer's office.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Was it not filed in the office of the Chief of Engineers?

Mr. BURTON. That, however, does not bring it before us, even if it were. I telegraphed the Chief of Engineers and asked for it, and he said it had never been published.

Mr. CROWLEY. I see an appropriation on page 68, section 6, for the improvement of the Wabash River, $35,000. I should like to have an explanation at about what point on the Wabash River this improvement is expected to be made, and what the character of the improvement is to be?

Mr. BURTON. That is at a place called New Harmony Cutoff. The situation is very similar to that created at Vicksburg, Miss., by the water cutting a channel across a bend, the one which General Grant sought to make as a military measure and which nature accomplished afterwards.

Mr. CROWLEY. Do you have to construct a dam at any point?

Mr. BURTON. We have to construct a dam to fill in the cut through which the water goes, because that is filled with rocks and shoals, and navigation through there is absolutely prevented. The aim of this dam is to carry the river around in its natural course, more circuitous, but susceptible of navigation.

Mr. CROWLEY. One more short question.

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. CROWLEY. Does this appropriation include anything in the way of constructing a dam or adding to the dam already constructed at Mount Carmel, Ill.?

Mr. BURTON. It does not.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BURTON. I greatly desire to conclude my remarks, if the gentleman will kindly excuse me. There are several general provisions in this bill. One of the most important is that which pertains to the creation of a board of review of five members, to be constituted by appointment by the Chief of Engineers. Such a measure as this we have found absolutely necessary. Pressure has been brought upon us through members of the House and from all parts of the country for the insertion in our bill of items which would either appropriate or commit us to the early appropriation of $300,000,000.

It is evident that local engineers in the different parts of the country have very different standards. One will take a project of a certain degree of importance that costs $200,000 and send in a glowing report recommending it. Another will take a project four times as important, that costs only $50,000, and he will send in a report saying it is not advisable. Now, we think the function of the local engineer should, measurably at least, be restricted to furnishing facts and figures, and that this board of review should, with all projects before them, make recommendations to Congress. It would make the recommendations somewhat similar to those pertaining to light-houses.

They are graded as desirable, necessary, and indispensable. Let us have more facts before us. We have been sitting here for weeks, holding daily sessions, with almost every member of the committee present. And I want to say to the House that if we have erred it has not been for lack of attention to this bill or study upon it, but with all the reports before us, bringing in engineers in many cases, I feel a great measure of doubt as to the desirability of some items included here, while probably some have been left out which perhaps ought to go in. But we have tried to do the best we could.

Mr. PUGH. Will the gentleman explain to us why the committee of which he is the distinguished chairman refused any aid whatever in furtherance of the project that has been for twenty-two years under way to give us slack-water navigation of the Big Sandy River and its tributaries in Kentucky and West Virginia?

Mr. BURTON. I will state that the committee thought where you have a main stream only partially improved, where great expense will be necessary, it is good business policy to finish that main stream before you go out and expend three, four, or five million dollars in improving a branch of it.

Another thing: The locating of a dam just below the mouth of the Big Sandy might render several of these dams absolutely unnecessary. The committee feel that they are entitled to credit for their course in that matter, and for their policy, as far as possible, of seeking not to scatter appropriations all over this country; improving the top of a stream before the bottom of it is improved, locating a dozen locks and dams scattered along a river where they can do no good; but we thought it best to adopt the policy of taking up those that are more important and finishing them. That is certainly the way an ordinary business concern would do, and we think this is only a business concern on a large scale, that should pursue a businesslike policy.

Mr. PUGH. Does not the gentleman know that the committee even refused the $50,000 additional appropriation for the two locks and dams for which the committee on March 3, 1899, had on an erroneous estimate made an appropriation of $450,000?

Mr. BURTON. That provision for one lock and dam was made under great pressure in this House; but another, however, was added in the Senate. Now I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. BREAZEALE. I find on page 55, $100,000 for the improvement of the Red River in Arkansas and Indian Territory, continuing improvement. Is not that a decrease of the usual appropriation of $150,000 per year heretofore made, and was not $150,000 recommended by the engineer in charge?

Mr. BURTON. One hundred and thirty-five thousand was called for by the Chief of Engineers. One hundred thousand dollars was the amount last appropriated. This is exactly the same amount as the last appropriation—at least that is the sum shown in our Estimate Book.

Mr. BREAZEALE. Was not that increased in the Senate?

Mr. BURTON. If it was increased in the Senate, $100,000 was the amount as it finally became law. We have appropriated the same sum.

Mr. BREAZEALE. One hundred and fifty thousand was the amount, the Chief of Engineers writes me.

Mr. BURTON. Now, I think the Chief of Engineers must be in error, because this Estimate Book is made up largely in his office. The amount last appropriated was $100,000. The amount called for by the Chief of Engineers was $135,000. I should like to see the letter if the gentleman has it in his possession. I think there is an error.

Mr. BREAZEALE. Very well.

Mr. PUGH. I notice that you refused the $50,000 additional to complete the two locks between Louisa and the mouth of the Big Sandy River, although it has been recommended by the local engineer in charge and by Captain Hodges.

Mr. BURTON. And very much pressed by the member from that locality.

Mr. PUGH (continuing). Also recommended by Colonel Roberts, of the Engineer Corps, and by the Chief of Engineers, General Wilson himself.

Mr. BURTON. I do not think the gentleman has understood what I have already said on these projects. We have projects before us recommended by local engineers and by the division engineers aggregating $300,000,000. Does not the gentleman see that, as a mere matter of computation, it is necessary to diminish that amount very materially? And he certainly can not expect that because a matter is recommended by the engineers it will go into this bill.

Mr. PUGH. What is there lacking in this matter to commend it to the favorable recommendation of this committee, if all the engineers in charge of this project clearly show that as a business proposition, with a view to the best interests of the public, the aid necessary to the completion of this project should be given?

Mr. BURTON. Because there are other projects four, six, or ten times more important than it, and certainly the committee could not take into favorable consideration all their projects.

Mr. PUGH. By no means. But I should like to ask the gentleman what there is lacking in this matter to commend it to equal consideration with other improvements, even in my own State?

Mr. BURTON. I think I must decline to yield further.

Mr. PUGH. I do not wish to get the gentleman into deep water, but rather would I invite his fair, equitable, and impartial consideration of the vast interests involved in this slack-water navigation matter.

Mr. BURTON. I do not think the gentleman can say anything that will get the committee into deep water or slack water. He is simply coming here and asking this committee to do an impossible and unjust thing—a thing that would be unjust to the House. If I could I would——

Mr. PUGH. I think a business House and business committees, when they look into the matter, would know that opening up the most valuable and extensive coal fields on the face of the globe would be a matter in which at least every citizen in each State bordering on the waters of the Ohio and the Mississippi below the mouth of Big Sandy River is deeply concerned.

Mr. BURTON. I am glad if the gentleman is through. The fact that he has continued as long as he has is an illustration of the difficulties under which this committee has labored during all this session. No man who had a project recommended by the engineers, whether it has behind it speculators, promoters not deserving of consideration, or whatever its merits, but has come to us with the idea that we must put his pet project into the bill.

Mr. PUGH. I want to say——

Mr. BURTON. I can not yield. The committee can judge some of the difficulties under which we have labored by what the gentleman says now.

Mr. PUGH. I desire to say that the gentleman knows——

Mr. BURTON. I decline to yield further. The committee will know something of the difficulties, with $300,000,000 of projects, with persistent importuning, sometimes amounting to personal recrimination, we have had in framing this bill. I do not say that this bill is free from defects. There are items in it that do not meet my individual approval; some of them are there because we are pursuing a policy that has been under way for years; some of them because we do not want to put the items entirely off the list that are near to completion, but we have certainly given close attention to these details.

We have tried to make our standard not what would make it equal between the different States of the Union or what would please members, but what would promote the commerce of this country, by selecting out great harbors and great and small rivers alike, with a view to stimulating the growing wealth and increasing the prosperity of the United States. [Applause.] We invite the fullest criticism. If there are items on this bill that any man regards as objectionable, let him rise in his seat. It is possible that in some cases, even with all the reports before us, we have not been able to form a correct judgment. But with its imperfections we submit this bill to the House, confident that it is a measure beneficial to all the people of the United States, one which will bring to them greater prosperity and aid in all the elements that give us greatness as a nation. [Applause.]

Mr. TONGUE. Mr. Chairman, I now yield twenty minutes of my time to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], and I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, in the limited time which has elapsed since the bill under discussion was reported to the House it has been impossible for members not on the committee to form an intelligent opinion as to the necessity for, or comparative importance of, the many projects provided for. I believe, however, that the committee, guided in its deliberations by its able chairman, has given careful, intelligent, and conscientious attention to the projects which have been presented to them, and I am inclined to accept the judgment of the committee with regard to the relative importance of the items contained in the bill.

My criticism of the committee in making up the bill is a criticism for acts of omission rather than of commission, and I am rather inclined to the opinion that failure on the part of the committee to act favorably in regard to certain matters in which the people of my section of the country are interested is due rather to a lack of knowledge of the importance of the great questions involved than from any disposition to ignore the proper claims of a great interest.

I appeared before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors when the bill now under consideration was being considered by them and requested the insertion in the bill of two items; one providing for the construction of reservoirs at the head of one of the tributaries of the Missouri River; the other containing provisions for surveys of reservoir sites in the arid and semi-arid States and Territories and reports thereon. The items are as follows:

Reservoirs at the head waters of the Missouri River: For construction along Piney Creek, Wyoming, of three reservoirs, in accordance with the recommendations submitted in House Document No. 141, Fifty-fifth Congress, second session, $50,000: Provided, That the Secretary of War may enter into a contract or contracts for such work and materials as may be necessary for the completion of such reservoirs, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made by law, not to exceed in the aggregate $165,000 exclusive of the amount herein appropriated: Provided further, That these reservoirs shall be emptied, as near as may be, each year between June 30 and September 30, the discharge of stored water to be under the direction of the State engineer or other State officer especially designated for the purpose by the State wherein such reservoirs are located; and beneficial use shall be the basis, the measure, and the limit of any right sought to be obtained to the use of any water so discharged.

The Secretary of War is hereby directed to cause preliminary surveys or examinations to be made of one or more reservoir sites in each arid and semi-arid State, and report upon the cost, practicability, and desirability of constructing such reservoirs and other works necessary for the storage and utilization of water to prevent floods, overflows, and erosion of river banks and levees, and for the reenforcement of the flow of streams and raising the water line therein during drought and low water, and to utilize the water so stored where practicable for irrigation, mining, or domestic purposes while it is in transit to replenish the streams during the season of low water, and the sum of $50,000 is hereby appropriated to carry out the purposes of this section.

Mr. Chairman, I do not find these items in the bill as reported by the committee. I have been unable to learn just why they were not inserted, though in a somewhat indirect and unofficial manner I have been informed that some of the members of the committee did not consider the items germane to a river and harbor appropriation bill. If this constitutes the ground on which these items were ignored, then the committee must have overlooked the fact that there is abundant precedent for these items on a river and harbor appropriation bill, as similar items have heretofore had place on bills of this character, notably the bills of 1880, 1881, 1882, 1884, 1886, 1888, 1890, 1892, 1894, 1896, and 1899, which in the aggregate appropriated $1,115,500 for reservoirs on the Upper Mississippi River, and the bill now under consideration contains an item of $300,000 for the repair and renewal of these reservoirs.

As for the second item, a similar provision was contained in the river and harbor bill of 1896, and under this provision the reservoirs for which we now propose an appropriation were surveyed and exhaustively reported upon by Capt. H. M. Chittenden, of the Corps of Engineers. So it seems that there is ample precedent for both of these items on a river and harbor bill.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman from Wyoming allow me an interruption?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Does the experience of the Government with respect to these reservoirs which he says have been constructed warrant appropriations for them?

Mr. MONDELL. I believe it does, Mr. Chairman. Engineers of the Government have reported that the construction of these reservoirs has resulted in increasing the navigable depth of the river 18 inches in time of low water for hundreds of miles below the reservoirs, and the gentleman will appreciate what a vast benefit to navigation that is.

There certainly could nave been no valid objection to the items on the part of the committee on the ground that the expenditure would not result in accomplishing the objects sought, for no one will claim that these reservoirs would not serve highly beneficial public purposes.

Mr. Chairman, in the last twenty years the United States Government has spent approximately $52,000,000 for the improvement of the Missouri and Mississippi rivers, and the bill now before us adds nearly $12,000,000 to this sum. In the same period of time the various riparian States have expended for levee construction on the Lower Mississippi about $20,000,000. Of the fifty-two millions which the Government has spent on these rivers, over fifteen millions have been for levee construction, making a total for levee construction alone in the past twenty years on the Lower Mississippi of upward of $35,000,000. This in addition to the vast sums which were expended by the levee organizations of the various States bordering the Mississippi prior to 1882, an expenditure which amounted to many millions.

Of all this vast expenditure by the States and by the nation, amounting to over $72,000,000 in less than twenty years, to be augmented if this bill becomes a law to eighty-four millions, the major portion has been expended to minimize and repair destruction by floods, to remove flood-formed obstructions to navigation, and to guard against flood inundations. The jetties themselves were built to remove the silt which the river brought down in its spring flood, to deposit where the mighty volume of the Gulf checked the onward rush of its turbid waters.

Each year vast expenditures were required to remove flood-built bars and shoals and flood-deposited snags, while the expenditure for levees is neither more nor less than an enormous outlay by the General Government for the protection of private property, for instead of permanently improving navigation, their effect is quite the contrary, as they confine the silt-laden waters within parallel banks, compelling the deposit of all solids within those narrow confines instead of allowing it to be deposited over the surrounding country as the waters spread.

A greater portion of this expenditure is not only ineffectual as a permanent remedy, but, in the case of dredging of flood-built bars, it must, under the present system, go on annually forever, and the building of levees, as is well understood, simply aggravates the situation, for as the flood-borne silt, held in its narrow channel, is annually deposited in the stream bed, the levees must, year after year, rise higher and higher in order to control the floods, postponing, but making more certain and terrible, the inevitable disasters of that fatal day when the mighty stream shall break the walls of its built-up channel and carry death and destruction in its wild rush to the sea.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not here to criticise the appropriations which have been made for the improvement of navigation or for the protection of private lands from inundation along the Mississippi and Missouri rivers, but rather for the purpose of calling the attention of this House to the fact that the appropriation which I have asked strikes at the root of the flood evil and tends to remove the cause, whereas the many millions which have already been spent have sought only to minimize the evil effects of the floods. While making these vast expenditures in an almost fruitless attempt to control the floods and repair their effects, why should not this Government, in the interest of navigation and in order to minimize flood destruction, hold back, at the sources and along the courses of the tributaries of the Mississippi and the Missouri, a portion, at least, of the waters that now go to swell these streams in time of flood?

The appropriation proposed is for certain reservoirs at the head waters of one of the tributaries of the Missouri, and this location is selected for the beginning of this important work owing to the fact that the proposed reservoirs have already been, in accordance with a provision in the river and harbor bill of 1896, surveyed and pronounced feasible by an officer of the Government, and their cost, as estimated by him, would be very low, considering the amount of water impounded. But it is proposed by the second item of the appropriation to have other surveys made and thereby provide for the storage of flood waters on other branches of these mighty rivers and on other streams.

Mr. Chairman, the present system of handling flood-built obstructions and protecting private property from inundation on the Mississippi and others of our navigable rivers is to a considerable extent confessedly but a makeshift, if not an aggravation of the evil. It seems to me, therefore, that it is high time that the River and Harbor Committee of this House and the House itself give some heed to a plan which gives promise of some permanent relief. That plan is the construction of reservoirs to hold back the flood waters—a plan which, it must be conceded, will, so far as it is carried out, be effective; for no man can deny that, to the extent of the waters impounded, the reservoiring of flood waters is a permanent and complete preventive of flood destruction.

It has come to me in a roundabout way that one objection made to the insertion of the items which I proposed in the river and harbor bill was on the ground that the waters impounded might be used for the purposes of irrigation. If such an objection should be offered in any quarter, it is scarcely necessary for me to say how wholly trifling and puerile and unworthy of a statesmanlike view of this great question such an objection would be. On the assumption that the water which it is proposed to reservoir shall be used in whole or in part for the purposes of irrigation, that fact, instead of being an objection, is one of the best reasons for the construction of these reservoirs in the arid regions, for there the reservoirs could be successively filled and discharged during the flood period and the discharged waters spread over the lands for irrigation purposes, from which they would slowly percolate into the streams, thus largely augmenting the volume of water stored.

If, in addition to serving the purposes of flood protection and providing a continuous flow of water during the dry season for navigation, the waters thus impounded could, at great cost and infinite labor on the part of the people themselves and without cost to the Government, be carried out upon the deserts to fructify them, to make the waste places blossom, the valleys and hillsides, now barren, beautiful and fruitful, make possible the founding of homes, replace the howling of the coyote with the laughter of children and the music of the village bells, is there anyone so narrow, so biased, and churlish that he would withhold a Federal appropriation which will, beyond all question and cavil, serve the interests of navigation, simply because in the accomplishment of those objects these other and manifold blessings shall follow?

If there ever was a time when objections might reasonably be urged to appropriations of this character on the ground that the waters stored would be available for irrigation purposes, such an objection certainly is not valid at this time, if the party platforms count for anything, for each of the two great parties represented on this floor is pledged, in its last national platform, to promote the cause of irrigation.

The clause in the Republican platform is as follows:

In further pursuance of the constant policy of the Republican party to provide free homes on the public domain, we recommend adequate national legislation to reclaim the arid lands of the United States, reserving control of the distribution of water for irrigation to the respective States and Territories.

Our friends on the other side of the House also appreciated the importance of the question of irrigation, and in their national platform pronounce as follows:

We believe the National Government should lend every aid, encouragement, and assistance toward the reclamation of the arid lands of the United States, and to that end we are in favor of a comprehensive survey thereof and an immediate ascertainment of the water supply available for such reclamation, and we believe it to be the duty of the General Government to provide for the construction of storage reservoirs and irrigation works, so that the water supply of the arid region may be utilized to the greatest possible extent in the interests of the people while preserving all rights of the State.

We of the arid West now confidently expect that the members of both parties shall make good the declarations of their platforms by supporting appropriations for storage reservoirs in the arid region, particularly where the construction of such reservoirs comes within the legitimate scope of river and harbor appropriations for the control of flood waters and in the aid of navigation, and where, as in the appropriation which I propose, the aid to irrigation simply follows as an incident and as a valuable adjunct to the system of storage in aid of navigation.

I have understood that some hesitate on embarking in construction of the character proposed on the ground that it would be but the beginning of expenditures, the ultimate aggregate and limit of which they believe may not be accurately foreseen or calculated, but which, without giving the subject any particular study or investigation, they imagine may ultimately lead to the expenditure of enormous sums.

These fears, in my opinion, are not well grounded, and they arise largely from a misconception of the extent and character of the works which it is proposed the Government shall undertake. As an official announcement with regard to these matters, I quote the resolutions adopted by the National Irrigation Congress, which convened in Chicago last month, and which are as follows:

We hail with satisfaction the fact that both the great political parties of the nation in the last campaign declared in favor of the reclamation of arid

America in order that settlers might build homes on the public domain, and to that end we urge upon Congress that national appropriations commensurate with the magnitude of the problem should be made for the preservation of the forests and the reforestation of denuded areas as national storage reservoirs, and for the construction by the National Government as part of its policy of internal improvement of storage reservoirs and other works for flood protection, and to save for use in aid of navigation and irrigation the waters which now run to waste, and for the development of artesian and subterranean sources of water supply.

The water of all streams should forever remain subject to public control, and the right of use of water for irrigation should inhere in the land irrigated, and beneficial use be the basis of measure and limit of the right.

There have been widely divergent views held in the past by the people of the arid West relative to the scope and extent of works which the National Government should be asked to undertake, directly or indirectly, in the aid of irrigation, but this declaration of the Irrigation Congress represents the crystallized thought and opinion of the majority of those who have most carefully studied the subject.

Let it be clearly understood, then, that there is no general disposition to have the National Government embark in the enterprise of irrigating arid lands. Even those who believe that such a policy would be wise and beneficial, but who have given the subject careful study, appreciate the fact that Congress will authorize the inauguration of no such policy, and even if it were inclined to do so, there are grave doubts whether such a policy would be practicable or satisfactory for many reasons, but particularly owing to the divergent water laws and customs of the various States.

What we ask is that the National Government shall undertake the truly national work of storing and controlling flood waters by the construction of storage reservoirs, and in some instances by the diversion of the larger streams in the arid regions from their natural channels where such diversion would effect a conservation of the flood flow and the work is too stupendous to be undertaken by private capital. While asking that the Government shall store the floods, now an element of waste and destruction, we contend that it is no valid objection to this proper and effective expenditure by the General Government to say that after the waters have been discharged from the Government reservoirs and returned to the stream beds the people of the West may, at infinite labor and expense, divert these waters to the arid valleys and uplands, to make the desert fruitful and the waste places glad.

Keeping in mind, then, the fact that the work that the nation should undertake in the arid regions should be confined to enterprises of a public character and which can not properly be undertaken by the States or associations of individuals, the inauguration of such work by the National Government would open up no such wide avenue of expenditures as is popularly supposed. The number of eligible reservoir sites is unfortunately comparatively limited, and no one need be terrified with visions of large appropriations running into the indefinite future for this class of work.

On the other hand, consider the benefits which would flow from such expenditure in addition to the permanent aid to navigation and the lessening of destruction by floods.

If in the next twenty years we were to expend in the construction of storage reservoirs in the arid region the amount which has been spent in the past twenty years by the United States alone for levees on the Lower Mississippi and for the removal of flood-built obstructions to navigation on that stream and the Missouri River, we could build a comprehensive reservoir system at the head of every tributary of the Missouri and Mississippi in the arid and semiarid region.

We would thereby, to the extent of the waters reservoired and conserved, permanently and appreciably aid navigation and lessen flood destruction, and while thus accomplishing more permanent benefit than has resulted from the outlay I have referred to, in addition thereto, without the expenditure of a single additional dollar by the National Government, would make possible and certain, through the utilization of the impounded waters by private enterprise after it had served its public purpose and been released from the reservoirs, the reclamation by irrigation of millions of acres of lands now arid and barren; the development and growth of regions now comparatively undeveloped and desolate; the addition of millions to our population and of hundreds of millions to our wealth, affording an opportunity for the securing of homes by the rapidly accumulating homeless and landless among our citizens, and assuring an ever-growing and expanding market for our trade and our manufactures.

I am aware that certain interests in our country are short-sighted and narrow enough to oppose these appropriations for the very reason that the proposed work would, in addition to its benefits which lie within the aim and scope of the river and harbor appropriation, open new lands to settlement and cultivation and bring the products of these lands possibly into competition with the products of lands now under cultivation.

Objections of this class are entitled to as much weight as the objections of the citizens of a seaport town already having 25 feet of water on their bar to appropriations in aid of a feasible project to provide the same depth of water at another harbor on the ground that such a project might deprive them of a part of their commerce would be; furthermore, the fears of this class of people are entirely unfounded. No matter what the Government may do; no matter how earnestly and energetically individual enterprise may go on developing irrigation projects and supplementing national expenditure, the additions to our arable lands in the future through reclamation by irrigation must, in comparison with the enormous additions by settlement in our humid region since the civil war, ever be lamentably insignificant.

We are now a nation of 76,000,000 souls, demanding to keep pace with our growth in population the addition of large areas to our arable lands yearly, but the National Government has not to-day, outside of some limited timber tracts, a single compact 160 acres in all its 500,000,000 acres of public lands upon which may be produced with reasonable certainty each year a good crop of wheat, corn, or cotton without artificial irrigation. The Eastern farmer need have no fear that the development of the arid West will be to his disadvantage by reason of the increased competition. With every possible agency at work we can not from now on increase our acreage of arable land by irrigation reclamation fast enough to keep pace with the increased consumption of our own population.

The prevention of flood-wrought obstructions to navigation and the increase and maintenance of a uniform depth of water in our navigable streams have always been important subjects for consideration in connection with a river and harbor bill. We now link with these subjects the important one of irrigation and insist that appropriations for the former purposes shall not be denied because they indirectly serve to aid in the accomplishment of the latter object, to the consummation of which both great parties stand solemnly pledged.

The irrigation of our arid domain is to-day the most important question of internal policy before the American people, and whatever their views may be as to the advisability of extending our control over lands beyond our continental borders, there can be no division of opinion as to the duty and responsibility of annexing arid America—one-third of our imperial domain on this continent—by assisting in the conquest of her irrigable deserts, making them fit for the uses of civilization, and thereby furnishing homes for the increasing millions of our population and an ever-expanding market for our manufactures.

I shall append hereto, as a part of my remarks, the very clear and forcible statement as to the necessity and advantages of Government aid in the construction of storage reservoirs, contained in the letter of Lieut. Gen. Nelson A. Miles to the Irrigation Congress held at Chicago last November:

My interest in the subject of irrigation began some three decades ago when, in the performance of official duty, I had occasion to explore more or less thoroughly that vast extent of sparsely settled or unoccupied land bounded on the east by the one-hundredth meridian, on the north by the forty-ninth parallel, on the south by the Rio Grande, and extending to the Sierra Nevada and Cascade ranges on the west.

The thought often occurred to me then, and the thought has grown into a conviction as the years have gone by, that it was not a part of the economy of nature to have this enormous expanse of land lie inert and waste. Millions of acres were apparently desert, where the coyote starved and only the cactus and sage brush could live; yet the soil held within itself the elements of productiveness, the air was pure as heaven, scenery as inspiring as a beautiful picture, the application of the vivifying water being the only thing lacking to arouse its rich potential energies.

Since those early days I have from time to time, with voice and pen, done what I could to advocate the conservation of the water supply of our arid lands and the preservation of the trees, which are the guardians of the fountains at the waters' source. Ten years ago I responded to an invitation to express my views in public print on the subject of our unwatered empire. I would refer you to those views now, as I have had no reason to materially alter them.

Since the foundation of our Government the center of population has been steadily moving westward, the pioneer spirit of the East seeking homes and independence far away from the stifling atmosphere of the large overcrowded cities. This united desire of our people to own a home rather than to rent one—to be their own landlord rather than some landlord's tenants—assured the vitality of the great American Republic. The American is so sovereign to-day, and the dignity and independence engendered by his free environment, the healthfulness of his mind and body resulting from the pure air he breathes, the love of country which home owning stimulates, make him the preserver of those beneficial institutions under which we live.

It would be a sad day, full of evil portent to the Republic, if home building should become unpopular, if gravitation toward the cities should overcome the outward march into the expansive country, if tenantry in an overcrowded alley should be chosen in preference to a free quarter-section in valley or upland. Therefore, I say, the devising means whereby the public domain is made available for home seekers and the arid lands are made habitable and productive is now one of the most important lines of American endeavor. I reiterate the saying of the keen satirist and wise philosopher: "That whoever could make two ears of corn or two blades of grass to grow upon a spot of ground where only one grew before would deserve better of mankind and do more essential service to his country than the whole race of politicians put together."

The utility of irrigation ceased to be questioned thousands of years ago, and we have the records of successful methods which are as old as the first pages of written history itself. We have evidence that the aborigines of the Southwest had perfected a system of irrigation, and the natives of New Mexico and Arizona, who brought their methods from Mexico and Spain, handed down their skill to posterity. These methods are at once simple, inexpensive, and effective, and can easily be adapted to the needs of a large proportion of our great arid country.

I am not optimistic enough to believe that the ingenuity of men can encompass the redemption of the 600,000,000 acres which comprise the nation's vacant public lands; but if, as has been claimed, there is water enough for the irrigation of 100,000,000 acres, providing the supply is economically used,

I can easily imagine 10,000,000 good citizens finding homes on farms which are self-supporting. In the State of Texas there are still many millions of acres of unclaimed areas which would lend themselves readily to irrigation methods and become valuable to settlers.

The area of this great State may be appreciated by remembering the fact that if it were populated as densely as the State of Massachusetts there would be over ninety millions of souls within its borders. But it is the immense tracts that embrace a large part of Arizona, New Mexico, Utah, and Nevada, much of Wyoming, Colorado, California, and Oregon, and the basin of the Columbia in interior Washington, which comprise mainly the public domain the reclamation of which you are strenuously advocating. Whether this great work is to be left to private or corporate enterprise, whether it shall be turned over to the States in which the land is situated, for such treatment as is thought best by those most interested, or whether the National Government, the owner of this vast arid region, should perform the duty of reclamation, are questions which you are no doubt now ably discussing.

It appears that private or corporate enterprise can not be trusted to control the improvement with justice and equality for all concerned. The States themselves are, as yet, not financially strong enough to undertake the task. It seems to me, therefore, that the plan proposed by one of the members of your association is the most feasible and just. It is: "Let the Government build the storage reservoirs and the main-line canals, and the settlers provide the smaller distributing system by banding themselves together in cooperative organizations."

I believe that Congress is awakening to a sense of the importance and propriety of lending national aid to the movement. Already considerable sums have been appropriated for the purpose of investigating hydrographic conditions, measuring streams, making reservoir surveys, etc., and I believe that before long the policy of national aid in the building of storage reservoirs will be established.

The Government has spent over $11,000,000 in improving the navigation of the Missouri River, and as its middle course is through an arid or semiarid region, and as the necessity for water transportation increases in direct ratio to the productiveness of the land through which the river flows, it seems logical and right that the attention of the Federal authority should now be given to the conservation, for irrigation purposes, of its surplus flood, which does such great damage along its lower course when, swelled by melting snows, its mighty volume bursts through its expensive confines.

The National Government has appropriated to June 30, 1900, for expenditure by the Mississippi River Commission $37,647,780.17, of which $15,403,901.57 was expended for levees. There must be added to this latter item over $15,000,000 contributed by the States, making thirty and a half millions expended in efforts to confine the surplus wealth of vitalizing fluid contributed by mountains until it is lost in the great ocean. Think of the thousands of farms that could be made productive by the judicious expenditure of only a part of this great sum. There are able engineers who even question the wisdom of constructing artificial banks, claiming that sooner or later the resistless flood will break through, and when it does the damage will be a thousandfold greater than it would were the waters allowed to spread as nature permitted.

But there is no question as to the utility of storing up a portion of the flow of water that runs away in nonirrigation seasons, that it may be available for use during the growing periods. As a distinguished United States engineer, referring to the arid regions of the West, reports: "In no other part of the United States, nor anywhere else in the world, are there such potent and conclusive reasons of a public as well as a private nature for the construction of a comprehensive reservoir system."

I also present, as a most clear and forcible statement on the subject of Government aid in the construction of storage reservoirs, the address delivered by Capt. Hiram M. Chittenden, United States Corps of Engineers, before the Irrigation Congress held in Chicago last November.

The industrial growth of any country and its capacity for high civilization depend in an eminent degree upon its agricultural development. In the western portion of the United States this development is limited by the amount of running water available for irrigation. In the natural condition of the streams only a portion of their flow is so available, and it is imperative that another portion be held back in times of high water, in order that all may be used. The storage of the waste flow of its streams thus becomes an indispensable condition to the highest development of the Western country.

While public opinion, guided by an intelligent understanding of the conditions, is certain to be agreed upon this point, there will be less unanimity of opinion as to what is the proper agency for accomplishing the work. But the logic of the situation is steadily enforcing the conclusion that there is only one agency broad enough and powerful enough to handle so large a proposition in the way it should be handled. The benefits that flow from the storage of water cover a wide and diversified range. They extend to different communities and even to different States. They are interstate in character, and fall in the same category with those arising from works in aid of interstate commerce. The great cost of developing a comprehensive storage system, and the impossibility of controlling its benefits so as to derive a direct and tangible revenue from them, exclude private agencies, and even the individual States, from undertaking the work. The function clearly pertains to the General Government, that sovereignty which covers all the country and embraces the streams from their sources to the sea.

The truth has long been recognized by the National Irrigation Congress, and, thanks to its active and intelligent propaganda, as well as to that of the National Irrigation Association, it has now also been recognized by the two great parties in our national politics. Undoubtedly a campaign of education must yet be carried on before so important a policy becomes finally established, but all the arguments upon which it rests are thoroughly understood, and it seems unnecessary to go over them again here. In opening this discussion, therefore, I shall spend no time in considering propositions which we accept as already definitely settled, but shall take up a few of the practical questions that relate to the matter of inducing the Government to undertake these works.

As in the first stages of every new movement, there will be encountered in this the inertia of conservatism on the part of Congress. It was so in the early days of the Government in regard to works in aid of interstate commerce, and it will be so now. It is natural and right that Congress should insist on being convinced that the step is a proper one before it is taken. The difficulty will not be in demonstrating the necessity or importance of the works in themselves, but that the Government is the proper agency to undertake them. Now that both political parties are committed to this policy, it would seem that the battle is as good as won, provided that it be found practicable for the Government to undertake the work, and that it do not entail a burden of excessive magnitude nor inaugurate a policy which is contrary to the genius of our institutions.

As to the burden involved, if the work be limited strictly to reservoirs it will be a comparatively light one—a mere bagatelle compared with the cost of other river works now being carried on. The possible expansion of the reservoir system of the West is in reality very limited—far more so, unfortunately, than one might wish it to be. The lack of good reservoir sites and the existence of other natural difficulties are going to restrict the work more than anyone can appreciate who has not traveled extensively through the Western country. One or two million dollars a year will carry on the work as fast as it will ever be needed, and after it is well under way its benefits will practically pay for what remains to be done. Congress, we may rest assured, will never reject a meritorious project so long as it involves no greater burden than that.

"But," some one will say, "even if the project is limited to reservoirs, there will be no end to applications for Government expenditure. Every community in the West will think that it must have a reservoir, and every creek and river in the mountains will demand attention." That is entirely true, but, after all, it is more of a bugaboo than a serious danger. If every demand had to be complied with, if every reservoir asked for had to be built, then indeed the Government would be in a bad way. But this matter will be treated exactly as a similar condition is treated in the river and harbor bill. When these projects come into Congress, as they now do in great numbers, preliminary examinations are ordered, and a separate provision is made for them in the bill. They are conducted at trifling expense and are reported upon at the ensuing session of Congress, so that no time is lost in securing consideration of them. It will surprise many to learn to what a great extent these preliminary examinations give the quietus to unworthy projects.

Out of a total of 1,230 examinations under the river and harbor bill down to 1897, only 570 were reported favorably, and of these only 407, or less than one-third, were reported favorably upon further survey. An adverse report ordinarily kills such a measure at the start. When a project is favorably reported it is in line for direct appropriation for construction. If it be of such magnitude or importance as to require detailed surveys and estimates before construction is begun, then an appropriation is first made for these surveys. When construction is ordered it has been usual in later years to provide an allowance which shall insure the completion of the work within a specified time.

This system of inaugurating and constructing public works is founded upon business principles and is the outgrowth of long experience. I believe it to be as well designed to protect the public from imposture and to secure a just return for their money as it is possible to devise. Its drawbacks are of a character which can not be avoided, for they arise from the nature of our Government and the power which rightly reposes in the hands of the people, whereby it will occasionally happen that local influence will force through measures against the reports based upon official investigation. In the case of reservoir construction, however, the liability to take up ill-advised projects will be even less than in the case of river and harbor works. I doubt if there is any other class of works in which the data for deciding the question of merit are of a character so definite and easily determined. So long as these projects have to pass the scrutiny of independent and nonpolitical investigation the public need have no fear that any very flagrant instance of unworthy expenditure will occur

The crucial question upon which this matter will turn relates to the probable consequences of so radical a departure. If the Government takes up the construction of reservoirs in the arid regions, will it not commit itself to a general policy of reclaiming the arid lands, with the multitudinous details and the unlimited outlay which such a policy will entail? There will be a deep distrust of the movement, lest it drag the Government into the construction of irrigation works as such, and the establishment of laws and regulations governing the use of stored water. It is the dreaded ramification of such a system and the unseen lengths to which it may lead that will cause Congress to hesitate when asked to act upon this matter.

Now, there can be, in my judgment, no doubt in the minds of thinking men who carefully study the question that it would be exceedingly unwise for the Government to enter upon the business of irrigation, even on the unsettled public domain of the West. Consider what such a policy would mean. While the storage of water is essentially a thing of general concern, pertaining to streams that flow from one State to another, the irrigation ditch is essentially a local concern, pertaining to the land, and naturally subject to local State regulations. On this principle the irrigation system of the West has grown up. It is absolutely in the hands of the States. The irrigation laws differ materially in the different States, but under each vested rights have become established, judicial construction has crystallized into a powerful body of law, administrative regulations have reached a high state of perfection, and the whole business has developed into an elaborate and satisfactory system. There is no complaint in any quarter that it does not meet fairly well the necessities of the situation.

To permit or require the General Government to enter this same field would result in endless confusion and complication. It is not a practical proposition at this stage of irrigation development. Existing systems are too well established and vested rights too thoroughly intrenched to permit of it. Moreover, it would not be desirable, even if practicable. It is contrary to the theory and spirit of our institutions for the General Government to take control of matters which are essentially local in character. It would involve the Government in the multitudinous and complex details of a vast industrial system where these details can be managed more satisfactorily by the local authorities. So far does the business of irrigation enter the very life of the Western people, and so large a part of the local law relates to this subject that if the General Government were to enter the field, it would virtually replace local government over a vast portion of the national domain.

That these are certain to be the views of Congress when the question again comes up for consideration may be seen in the expressions which have already emanated from that body. Let those who would get at the pith of this matter study the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the latter part of the third session of the Fifty-fifth Congress, when the debate took place in the Senate upon the Warren amendment to the river and harbor bill providing for the construction of two reservoirs in the arid regions. This debate makes it very clear that it is not the principle of Government construction of reservoirs, nor even the cost of the work, that will find opposition in Congress, but the fear that such a policy will lead to the inauguration of a Government system of irrigation works in the West and to an interference with existing systems established by the States.

Senator STEWART, of Nevada, who favored the amendment, insisted that it must be so drawn that the proposed works should not interfere with the State system. Otherwise the proposed law, he said, "would be utterly destructive" and impossible of administration.

Mr. RAWLINS, of Utah, was also favorably disposed to the proposition, but with this reservation: "If these moneys are expended by the Government, it must be with the distinct understanding that the reservoirs are to be created, first, subject to all the rights to the use of the water already accrued, and, secondly, to the control of the States themselves in respect to the management and disposition of the waters thus impounded."

Senator TELLER said: "I do not know whether it is a wise thing to do or not. If the General Government should attempt at any time to assert control over the water, I should say it was an exceedingly unwise thing. I am sure that the State which I in part represent, if called upon to grant the Government the right to build a reservoir on its soil, would insist that the Government should not control the water in the slightest degree; that while it may impound the water for a time, it should certainly let the water loose when the time comes for irrigating use in the State."

Among the Eastern members who discussed the measure, Senator SPOONER, of Wisconsin, gave it the most thorough and searching examination. The burden of his remarks was that he feared that the policy of building storage reservoirs would be a stepping stone to that of building ditches and other irrigation works, and that he considered it not only wrong in principle, but contrary to the Constitution. He said in part:

"If this were the end of the proposition, even if it involved a vastly larger sum, I should not object to it; but I believe it is only the beginning. I can see no reason why this appropriation should be made to construct a reservoir for irrigation purposes in one State and not made from time to time in all the States, and in all the places in all the States where irrigation may require the construction of similar reservoirs. What I dread about this business is that it is the committal of the Government to a principle which I believe to be paternalistic and wrong, and which will involve the expenditure of countless millions of dollars before we are through with it."

It is evident from these expressions that Congress will not be unfavorably disposed toward the Government construction of reservoirs, but will be absolutely opposed to going into the irrigation business. Here, then, is one rock which we should try to avoid lest it cause us shipwreck. The reservoir question must be divorced from the irrigation question so far as active aid from the General Government is concerned. But is it possible to do this? Entirely so.

The reservoir question is a question by itself. The conservation of the waste flow of our streams does not pertain exclusively to irrigation, but to all the uses that are made of running water and to the dangers that arise from floods. Their purpose is to regulate the flow of streams so that they may more fully serve the purposes of man. There is no obligation whatever that the builders should follow the course of these streams and see that the water is used thus and so. Forests are being preserved by the Government in part because of their supposed influence in regulating stream flow, but does that give the Government any right to control the local use of the waters that flow from them? Several years ago there was a great craze on the subject of rain making, and many unstable minds actually believed that some alchemic formula would be discovered to extract from the atmosphere the golden moisture that was not there.

But suppose that this impossible scheme had succeeded and that the Government had gone into the shower business on a large scale, would that have justified it in attempting to control the local uses of the increased flow of the streams? Now, the case of the reservoir is exactly the same. Its purpose is to give the streams more water at certain seasons than they had before—to enlarge the resources of nature. It is not in any way incumbent upon the Government to regulate the use of this water after it leaves the reservoir. The laws, regulations, and administration which were good enough for the stream in its natural condition will be good enough for it in its enlarged condition.

To show how this principle could be given practical effect, suppose that the Government were to build a reservoir somewhere in the arid regions. It would require title and jurisdiction to all the land in any way essential to its construction and maintenance, and such other rights as were necessary or important. Having constructed the work, it would control its management under regulations designed to make the stored waters serve the greatest good to the community at large; that is, it would regulate the overflow as nearly as possible to meet the natural demand for the water. This would be an easy matter to determine, and there should never be any difficulty about it.

There would, in my opinion, be no necessity for even consulting the local State authorities, for all the data are well known and the Government could have no object in controlling the water otherwise than for the general good. The moment the released waters leave the Government property, they should pass absolutely to the same local control which governs the stream in its natural condition. All questions relating to the use of this water should remain exactly as at present. In this way the Government would avoid all interference in irrigation matters and all the complications and burdens which would result from such interference.

In thus making the waters of the reservoir free to the people, as are those of the stream in its natural state, a difficulty arises in the minds of many persons who can not get rid of the idea that the Government should collect a toll or tax for the water stored. Accustomed as they are to pay such a tax for the use of the waters stored by other agencies, they have come to look upon the levy as an inherent condition in the construction of such works, and can not understand how the Government can get its money back in any other way. If it makes no charge, then its work looks like a free gift—an expenditure of so much of the people's money for the gratuitous benefit of particular localities.

This is an entirely erroneous view, and until it is thoroughly eradicated the true scope and character of Government works can not be understood. When a farmer lays out a sum of money to dig a well on his farm, he does not charge himself so much a pailful for all the water he draws from it. That would be simply taking money out of one pocket and putting it into another. But he gets a return for his outlay none the less surely in the greater facility with which his business is carried on and in the resulting increase in the value of his property.

So it is with Government work. Take the great lock at Sault Ste. Marie, through which there now passes a commerce whose magnitude the mind can hardly comprehend. Would the Government be any better off if it should charge a toll on this commerce, and go into the always vexatious and troublesome business of collecting it? Does not it already derive a greater revenue in a far less expensive and disagreeable way? The reduction in freights, which this canal makes possible, reduces the cost of living and increases the general wealth all over the United States. The Government, whose revenue comes from various taxes upon articles of daily life, finds this revenue increased in proportion with the increase of wealth, and everything which it can do to augment the wealth of its people will operate to augment its own income.

Of no class of public works will this be more certainly true than of reservoirs. The uses of the impounded waters reach so far and affect so many interests that their benefits to the Government would be far greater than any revenue which it could derive from a tax on the use of the water.

Let these two principles, then, be given corporate form in the resolutions which this congress may present to the National Congress in asking for Government aid in the construction of storage reservoirs:

1. That the water so stored shall be for the free use of the people, subject only to such laws and regulations as may be in force in the States through which they flow; and

2. That, in thus advocating the construction of reservoirs by the Federal Government to conserve the waste waters of the arid regions, this Congress disclaims any purpose of drawing the Government into a policy of constructing irrigation works, or of enacting legislation for the control of the waters used in irrigation, as in its judgment such matters should be left exclusively to the States as at present.

And in proposing a law for the appropriation of money to build any reservoir, particularly the first which may be built, it should contain the following provisions:

1. That the waters so stored shall be for the free use of the people and shall be released under regulations to be established by the Secretary of War (or the Interior, as the case may be).

2. That the waters so released shall, after flowing off the Government reservoir property, become a part of the stream in its natural condition, and be subject to the laws and regulations of the State or States through which they flow.

3. That the construction of this reservoir, or of any other that may hereafter be built, shall not in any way commit the Government to a policy of constructing irrigation works, nor of controlling the distribution of the waters which flow from such reservoirs.

With a clear understanding upon the foregoing points, I do not believe that there will be any insuperable obstacle in the way of securing appropriations from Congress. The question of the lack of constitutional authority to build these works was most effectually disposed of by Senator GALLINGER in the debate on the Warren amendment. His remarks were so pertinent, and so full of hope and encouragement to the movement which this congress and association represent, that they will justify repetition here. He said:

"Mr. President, the people of the great West, where the rainfall is deficient, come here and in this river and harbor bill ask for a very small appropriation to make an experiment in the matter of building reservoirs, which they contend are primarily for the promotion of commerce, but which, to my mind, are very much in the same position that the reservoirs are at the head waters of the Mississippi and the levees that line the banks of that stream. We are solicitous sometimes about the Constitution, and we are not solicitous about it at other times. I think we have transgressed the letter of that instrument, and perhaps the spirit of it, over and over again, and it may be that we are trenching upon it somewhat in adopting these amendments.

"But, Mr. President, it has been the tenet of my faith since I have been a member of this body to vote for almost every proposition that those great Western States have asked at the hands of Congress. I do not think they share in the benefactions of this Government in the same degree that the Eastern and Middle States share them, and for my part I am willing to take a little chance regarding the constitutionality of any measure that the Senators representing those States ask for at our hands, and I am willing to take that chance to-day.

"I rose, Mr. President, simply to say that this is certainly no greater transgression of the Constitution than when we are voting away the people's money to build along the Mississippi and Missouri rivers what are called harbor improvements. That money is voted simply for the purpose of protecting the towns and railroads that lie on the banks of the river, and for no other purpose on earth. We say it is designed to improve commerce, but as a matter of fact it is designed to protect the property of the citizens, which, if we did not make these appropriations, would be swept away, and they would be reduced to the condition of abject poverty and of suffering. I vote for these appropriations. I vote for them cheerfully, and upon the same line of argument I shall give what little influence I have and my vote in support of these amendments."

That is the whole question of constitutionality in a nutshell. The reservoirs at the head waters of the Mississippi would never have been built if the improvement of the navigation of that river had been the real motive behind them. More powerful than the interests of navigation were those of the logging business of northern Minnesota and of the great water powers at St. Anthony Falls. The levees of the Mississippi would never be built if they were being built for navigation. The primary, if not the only, purpose of levee construction is the protection of private property from floods.

The works now being constructed along the Missouri River from its mouth to its source are primarily for the protection of private property, whatever the official statement of their purpose may be. All these motives are worthy, and the works justifiable, but the interests of navigation are in every case a secondary or incidental consideration. Congress understands this perfectly well, but it still does not come out directly and support these measures on their merits. It disguises the true purpose under a purpose which is not the true one, and in so doing deals unfairly with the public.

As Senator Gray said in the debate already quoted from: "We ought not in legislation play tricks upon our own understandings;" and it would be a more frank and open course for Congress to specify the true purpose of these expenditures. If they are constitutional, then the storage of water for the primary purpose of irrigation is constitutional. There is nothing in the Constitution or out of it that will justify the storing of water for the mills at St. Anthony Falls or the building of levees to protect the Mississippi bottoms that will not justify the construction of reservoirs in the arid regions whereby the barren desert may be made productive and homes be provided where are now only cactus and sagebrush.

In citing the class of expenditures commonly called the river and harbor bill the purpose is to call attention to the results of experience in a system of public works which has itself evolved the greatest artificial reservoir system in the world, and which furnishes us the best guide we now have in regard to future works of this character. It is a public measure which receives its full share of ridicule, and yet no public measure has a more persistent lease of life. It has no official propaganda, for the Department in whose charge it rests holds absolutely aloof from advocacy of any of its measures.

It rests with the people, originates with them, and is in the fullest sense a popular measure. The slurs often cast upon it arise mainly from the fact that many people draw their conclusions from trifles instead of essentials. The vast sums spent on the great harbors and other important works they readily admit to be properly spent there, but they condemn the bill because it wastes a thousand or two on this or that waterless stream out West somewhere.

In other words, they anathematize a great measure simply because it contains a few unworthy projects. Now, this same difficulty will be encountered whenever the reservoir project is taken up. There will be some unworthy measures without question. It is part of the price which we have to pay in a popular Government for the support of other measures which are truly of great importance.

It is no more than justice to those States which receive no portion of the public expenditures on rivers and harbors, yet contribute to pay for them, that some consideration should be given to the streams in their own section. The carrying of a boat or raft is not the only public use to which a stream may be put, and many of the streams of the far West will yet be turned to as much account as are to-day the navigable waters of the Ohio and the Mississippi.

In the two years 1866 and 1867 there was appropriated for the improvement of rivers and harbors the sum of nearly $40,000,000, most of it for important work, but some, no doubt, for work of questionable importance. This expenditure was well distributed throughout the country, extending even to Alaska and Hawaii, and including every State and Territory except Arizona, Colorado, Nevada, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming. It is not intended to assert that a general distribution of the expenditures under this bill is in itself a desirable thing, but merely to call attention to a fact. So far as this distribution arises from the practice of "logrolling" in Congress, not much can be said for it.

But this is so far from being the sole motive. Apart from the value of a work in itself after completion—that is, apart from the ultimate purpose for which it is undertaken—there is always an important local advantage arising from the progress of the work during construction and from its presence in a locality after it is constructed. What community but would be proud to boast the presence of a work like the great lock at Sault Ste. Marie, or a great reservoir dam such as will yet be built in the West? Not only is it a perpetual source of gratification and local pride, but it is a source of income as well, on account of the expenditures required for its maintenance. Again, in works of great magnitude the expenditure during construction is often such as to develop important industries for a number of years and yield great benefit to the communities where they occur.

There are thus ample reasons why the people view a general distribution of public expenditures as no more than a matter of justice. If, as often alleged, members of Congress occasionally recommend unworthy measures simply to enhance their popularity among their constituents, that fact should not be permitted to discredit the entire system. The desideratum in all such matters is, not that the distribution of expenditures be more restricted, but that their character be raised by eliminating those that are unworthy.

If, for example, Montana must have a slice of the river and harbor bill as the price of her support of important public works outside of her limits, how much better it would be to use that slice in constructing reservoirs on the tributaries of the Missouri than in improving the stream for a navigation which has almost entirely passed away. If the committees of Congress upon rivers and harbors would devote more of their energies to a thorough consideration of these obvious improvements in a great public measure and less to phantom fears of the possible consequences of doing something out of the ordinary line, they would render a greater service to their country.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] is recognized.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL].

Mr. BELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment, to be considered as pending subject to a point of order, which amendment I ask the Clerk to read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado offers the following amendment, to be considered as pending:

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after the word "dollars," at the end of line 11, at page 70, the following words: "And $300,000 for the building of reservoirs near the head waters of the Platte and Arkansas rivers, in the State of Colorado, and for channels diverting the high spring flows into the same, and for holding the same for the purpose of relieving the banks during the spring freshet of the Missouri and the Mississippi rivers; and that the navigable waters of said last-named streams may be increased during low water."

Mr. BELL. Mr. Chairman, during the recent conventions of both political parties the representatives of the Western States went before them and the Republican party declared that it would enter upon a policy of reclaiming the arid domain of the United States, as follows:

REPUBLICAN PLATFORM.

In further pursuance of the constant policy of the Republican party to provide free homes on the public domain, we recommend adequate national legislation to reclaim the arid lands of the United States, reserving control of the distribution of water for irrigation to the respective States and Territories.

Representatives of the same States went before the Democratic convention, and it announced in its platform that it would enter upon the reclamation by the Government of the arid domain if put into power.

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM.

We favor an intelligent system of improving the arid lands of the West, storing the waters for purposes of irrigation, and the holding of such lands for actual settlers.

In the campaign in all the arid States the Republican speakers and the Democratic speakers vied with one another, read and reread their platforms, each insisting that if their candidate should be elected they would more vigorously enter upon the performance of this promise than the other. In the State of Colorado, Senator WOLCOTT, on every stump, declared to the people that if Mr. McKinley and a legislature for his return should be elected they would enter upon this reclamation at once. Now, I say both parties have pledged themselves to enter upon the reclamation of the arid domain. Now, seeing this is true, as evidenced by both platforms, I want to state some conditions of the country through which these streams run.

Early in the spring, when the snows melt, the Platte River and the Arkansas River are flooding the entire country near their head waters, and flow into the Missouri and into the Mississippi, and the Government is spending untold millions every year to hold those waters within the banks of the Missouri and the Mississippi. Now, what we ask in this case is, that instead of spending all of this money for the purpose of holding the waters within the banks of the Missouri and the Mississippi, the Government enter upon the reservoir sites selected by it and set apart and expend some of this money in diverting the spring flow into these great reservoirs and holding it back to the relief of the streams below. And when they are holding it back from the Missouri and the Mississippi during the high tide they can well permit the farmer to use it there. It will percolate back to the streams by the time the water becomes low; then it will serve the purpose of raising the water during the low water.

Not only this, but it reclaims the public domain, permits the Government to sell it, puts it upon the market, and makes homes for the people of the United States. The arid-land States are perfectly willing that the price of the public domain with water may be increased. We do not ask the Government to run these reservoirs. We do not ask the Government to operate our system of irrigation. All we want the Government to do is to reclaim its own lands. And while reclaiming its own lands on streams like the Arkansas and like the Platte and like the Rio Grande it will not cost it a dollar, because it is putting the same money on levees below for the purpose of holding these waters, during freshets, within their banks.

Little do the people of the East know of the great possibilities of the great arid domain. Colorado last year produced in live stock and produce upon the farm more than $75,000,000 in values. The minerals in these mountain waters and the earth brought down in the muddy water acts as a daily fertilizer. The glaring light and the almost unbroken sunshine gives a flavor to fruits, melons, and many cereals not found in the humid climates. The saccharine matter in the sugar beet ranges from 17 to 23 per cent.

The great San Luis Valley, as large as the State of Massachusetts, and almost as level as a billiard table and as fertile as the valley of the Nile, is dependent on the Rio Grande, and the cultivation but fringes its margin, because the crop must be gauged by the supply of water in the low flow of August and September. Under these adverse conditions this great valley produces from a million to a million and a half bushels of wheat, and other crops in proportion. Enough water flows away unused in May and June to water every acre in the valley. Great basins are there, which would hold it till August and September if the outlet was closed, and this would enlarge the production of this great valley to from three to five million bushels of wheat and other crops in proportion and would relieve the overflow of the Rio Grande below.

The luscious fruits of the Uncompahgre, Gunnison, and Grand valleys have a national reputation. By taking the water from the Gunnison and Grand rivers and spreading it over these dry, parched valleys we would not only reclaim hundreds of thousands of acres of valuable public domain and make ideal homes for many of our homeless people choked up in the great cities, but would relieve the banks of the sluggish streams down near the Gulf at the same time.

The broad alfalfa fields and sugar production of the matchless Arkansas Valley would be more than quadrupled by storing the Arkansas, and the levees of the Missouri and Mississippi would be relieved, and the Government would sell hundreds of thousands of acres of land. Thousands of new American homes would be established in this fertile valley as an auxiliary to our great scheme of self-government.

The arid region of the West is unquestionably the greatest piece of territory on the American continent. There is nothing else like it, in my judgment, in this country. When I was going home a few months ago I found myself in the car with Booth Tucker going out to Colorado for the purpose of planting a colony from the State of New York. I said to him, "Why do you go from the State of New York? Why do you go from a country that is renowned the world over for its agricultural and horticultural possibilities to the dry, thirsty lands of the arid West to plant a colony?" He said, "I spent many of my early years in India. I found in India, from actual experience, that 1 acre of irrigable land with plenty of water was worth 4 to 5 acres of land in the humid climate with your chance rainfall." He added, "My object is to plant a colony where the individuals can be kept close together; that they can have common schools; they can have common halls; they can have their irrigating water in common. I can concentrate them better in Colorado under an irrigation system than I can in any spot in America where you depend upon haphazard rainfall." He told me of his plan. He told me at that time he was going to that colony for the purpose of giving them, or selling to them, 100 milch cows. He said, "We do not give them one cent. We sell to them; we give them an opportunity to work out their own salvation. We take them to these agricultural colonies that their families may not be separated, and we propose to make them self-sustaining, and we thereby relieve the overpopulated cities." I went last fall to Amity Colony, Colo., where they have abundance of water, and found numbers of these men there from the poverty-stricken districts of New York City, at that time owning 10 and 20 acres; some of them out of debt, with from 15 to 20 acres of land with a water right, that is worth at least $50 per acre. They have planted trees; they have planted gardens; they have planted fruit patches, and they are becoming absolutely independent. From the Arkansas to-day there is a little narrow strip of ground on both sides, only large enough to consume the water in the low flows; they can not afford to plant any more, and this among the richest grounds in America. I was there last year when they were building two sugar plants, and they produced over a million and a quarter dollars' worth of sugar in the first year. I was at Rocky Ford while these sugar plants were running an average of 1,000 tons of sugar beets every day. Around Rocky Ford is grown every year 7,500 acres of cantaloupes and watermelons. The Rocky Ford melon is known in London, the Greeley potato is known in London, Colorado apples are known across the water, the Colorado peach is known all over the United States, and we can grow everything in great abundance on this soil wherever water can be obtained. But I wish to say that the individual can not reclaim it. He can only plant on the river banks at such places as the water during the low flow will supply. But if the Government had these reservoirs, instead of selling the public land on the river banks, it would sell it all over the arid domain. We would sell it everywhere; we could, if need be, sell it for a higher price than it now brings. I do not care if you double it, if you think that justice would be done, so long as you reclaim this soil. It is worthless as it is. This is a part of the great scheme of handling this water. It will cost the Government but little; it will relieve the banks of the Mississippi; it will relieve the levees, and it will reclaim arid America.

Now, I say both parties have agreed to this in their national platforms. You Republicans pledged the people of the arid States that if you got their votes, you would enter upon this reclamation, and your orators from the East—because you were there, or the best of you [laughter]—and your orators of the West said on every stump in Colorado, "If McKinley is elected, we will enter upon the reclamation of the arid lands." Every Democrat that came to that State read the Democratic platform and said, "Bryan is a better reclamation man than McKinley, and if you vote for Bryan and he is elected, he will insist upon entering upon a systematic reclamation of the public domain."

I ask both parties to keep that pledge, and you can keep it. Now, so far as the Arkansas River and the Platte rivers are concerned, that proposition would not cost us a dollar, as what we put on the reservoirs above we would save from the expense of the levees below. We have the reservoirs surveyed at public expense. We have them set apart at public expense. We own the ground. All we ask of you is to build the channels, establish and strengthen the reservoirs, all of which can be done at a comparatively small expense, and we will reclaim our own soil and make homes for the homeless in this country, and we will add more to the wealth of the United States than we can do in any other possible way.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman from Colorado allow me a question?

Mr. BELL. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. Does not the gentleman think that it would be better for the United States Government to give the States the arid lands and let them do what they please with them?

Mr. BELL. We do not want them.

Mr. HILL. Why not?

Mr. BELL. Because whenever you turn the lands over to the poor States now struggling to raise money for ordinary expenses they will not be able to do anything with them in the way of irrigation.

Mr. HILL. But the gentleman says it is not going to cost anything; that the returns will be far greater than the outlay.

Mr. BELL. The States are not taking care of the Mississippi or the Missouri River.

Mr. HILL. Oh, no; but this is a speculation on a large scale to improve arid lands and make them tillable; and if it is going to be a profitable speculation, why not let the States make the money out of it instead of the Federal Government?

Mr. BELL. The trouble is, the States are too poor to do it.

Mr. HILL. But they will get rich under this speculation, according to the gentleman's argument.

Mr. BELL. Will the gentleman from Connecticut wait until I get through? In the second place, the people of these new States are not willing to have the public domain of these States put into the local legislature, and put into politics in the different States. They want one grand system of reclaiming the arid lands, and let it be common to every part of the United States, and let the Government manage it as it has managed the improvement of rivers and harbors.

Mr. HILL. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman, but does the gentleman mean to say that he can not trust the legislature of his own State and the legislatures of other States? Does he mean to say that they can not be trusted to handle the arid lands?

Mr. BELL. I mean to say this: That whenever you leave this to the States you will not be sure of the improvements being carried out. Here is Wyoming, that is not able to build a ditch; Colorado is not in a situation financially to advance the money. Then, again, you will have one land system in Wyoming, another in Colorado, a different one in Utah, a different one in Arizona, and there will be no harmony about it. Besides, if it is the governmental function to look out for the rivers and harbors of Connecticut and of the Mississippi Valley, to save it from overflows where they have a superabundance of water, it is a governmental function to look after the dry and thirsty soil of the great arid domain that is perishing for the want of water.

Mr. HILL. If the gentleman will excuse me for again interrupting, would not the same argument lead the United States Government to go into Connecticut and rake off the cobblestones from the farm lands?

Mr. BELL. No, sir; not by any means. Here is a Government that owns a majority of the land in these arid-land States. In Spain, China, India, France, Italy, Egypt, and all over the arid regions of Europe, and I do not know of a case in history where any great government having such arid lands has failed to take up the irrigation of such lands or aid in the construction of canals, and many of these canals costing millions of dollars; and then they reaped the benefit from the thrift and the success of their citizens through the common use of that water.

Not only that, but your party promised to reclaim the arid lands. You claim now, and insist on your party avoiding its promise by turning the lands over to the different States. Is that your idea?

Mr. HILL. I asked the question as a matter of information. If this is going to be a profitable enterprise for the United States Government, if the Government can make money out of this by reclaiming these lands and selling them at an increased price, why can not the States themselves do it? I think the gentleman from Colorado is mistaken in regard to irrigation in foreign countries. Irrigation in Egypt and Italy is by private enterprise. It is a joint-stock enterprise and not a government enterprise. I know of no country where they have taken up the irrigation of arid land by the government.

Mr. BELL. Some places may be by private enterprise, but the most of them have had government aid.

Mr. HILL. There is a law passed by Congress three or four years ago allowing joint-stock companies to organize under certain conditions to irrigate arid lands.

Mr. BELL. Yes; the Casey law permitted the States to reclaim a million acres; but the land will never be reclaimed under that law.

Mr. HILL. I think the gentleman from Colorado voted for it.

Mr. BELL. Well, I would vote for anything that will reclaim or tend to reclaim these arid lands. The trouble is, the gentleman from Connecticut does not understand the situation and the Eastern people do not understand the conditions or importance of the subject. I hope, however, that the Democrats and Republicans on this floor will read their respective platforms and that the Democrats will read Mr. Bryan's letter of acceptance before they cast a vote against this amendment.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. CUNNINGHAM, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 10785) granting a pension to Thomas White.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 11820) to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Cherokee tribe of Indians, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. THURSTON, Mr. PLATT of Connecticut, and Mr. JONES of Arkansas as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 11821) to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Muscogee or Creek tribe of Indians, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. THURSTON, Mr. PLATT of Connecticut, and Mr. JONES of Arkansas as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill and joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4208. An act for the relief of George K. Bowen; and

S. R. 149. Joint resolution providing for the distribution of compiled statutes of the District of Columbia to judges of United States courts.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution 89.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish Congress with a report showing the present condition of the breakwater at Burlington, Vt., with an estimate of cost for its proper repair and completion.

Senate concurrent resolution 90.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President be requested to return to the Senate the bill of the Senate No. 1226, granting an increase of pension to George G. Kemp.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE] thirty minutes, and I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to oppose the passage of this bill. I am in favor of river and harbor improvement, and if I have criticism for the committee it is not for what it has recommended, but for its failure to adopt at least one important and meritorious project that I think should be in the bill. I refer to the Ouachita River and tributaries. I shall at the proper time offer the following amendment, and hope that it will be adopted:

Insert between lines 21 and 22, on page 58, the following:
"Improving Ouachita and Black rivers, Arkansas and Louisiana: For the construction of two locks and dams, one below Monroe, La., and the other below Camden, Ark., according to the project, plans, and specifications submitted in Part IV of the Report of the Chief of Engineers, printed in House Document No. 2, second session Fifty-sixth Congress, to complete said locks and dams, $550,000; and the Secretary of War shall construct said locks and dams at two of such of the sites selected by said plan as will in his judgment most effectually lengthen the navigation of said rivers, and he may have said work performed by contract or otherwise, as in his judgment may be most economical and advantageous to the Government."

Mr. Chairman, Ouachita River flows for 500 miles in a southeasterly direction through Arkansas and Louisiana until joined by Tensas and Little rivers at Trinity, La. Below this for 60 miles it is called Black River, and enters Red River 35 miles above its mouth. The tributaries are Little River, which enters on the west at Trinity; Tensas and Macon, which unite and enter above Trinity, giving 250 miles of high-water navigation; Bœuf River, which enters from the east at Stafford Point and gives a high-water navigation of about 150 miles; Bayou d'Arbonne, which enters from the west above Monroe and gives a high-water navigation for 40 miles; Bayou Bartholomew, which enters from the east, 25 miles above Monroe, and gives navigation at high-water stages for 125 miles; Saline River, which enters from the same side, about 100 miles below Camden, is navigable at high-water stages for nearly 50 miles.

The main river and its tributaries combined afford over 1,000 miles of navigation at high-water stages, which exist on an average for six months in the year.

The people of the valley earnestly desire that the main river and its tributaries be so improved by a system of locks and dams as to continue this half-year navigation all the year.

CAN IT BE DONE?

Thirty years ago an examination of the Ouachita River was made and a project submitted for temporary improvement by the removal of snags and dredging the worst bars, and this work was commenced in 1871.

Since then a number of examinations and surveys have been made to ascertain the feasibility of improving the navigation upon some comprehensive plan.

In 1872 the engineer in charge recommended the improvement of it by locks and dams from Camden, Ark., to Trinity, La. This examination was made in less than three months, and the plan reported contemplated five locks and dams, 49 by 250 feet, with an average lift of 14 feet, at a cost of $1,163,083. In 1873 the maps and notes of the survey were reviewed by a board of engineers appointed for that purpose, and upon a full examination it was deemed necessary to resurvey the river to determine definitely certain questionable points that had not been sufficiently considered in the hurried examination.

The second survey was made in about six weeks, under explicit instructions to search for and connect with marks of the first and to utilize all of it that was found to be good.

In 1874 Captain Benyaurd reported that the plan of improvement by locks and dams was the only one that would give permanent and uninterrupted navigation throughout the entire year, but that the project as approved by the Department required revision on account of faulty location of dams, and because, if completed, it would only accommodate the very smallest of boats. For these good reasons the project for locks and dams was abandoned in 1874, and since then appropriations have been made only for removing wrecks, logs, snags, and at Catahoula Shoals a small amount of dredging has been done.

The river and harbor act of 1894 directed the Secretary of War to submit plans and estimates for the improvement of these rivers by locks and dams, to give slack-water navigation as far above the mouth of the river as, in his judgment, such improvement is practicable. Maj. J. H. Willard, the engineer in charge at that time, reported that, with the small amount of available funds on hand for that purpose, an exhaustive and correct survey of the river and the valley could not be made, and asked for $120,000 additional appropriation, making in all $150,000, to complete it. This was made, the project for further survey was approved, and since then the work has been prosecuted on an extensive scientific scale, that embraces all the features necessary to a clear understanding of every phase, considered from an engineering standpoint, such as a traverse line, precise levels, ordinary levels, topography, hydrography, temporary and permanent gauges, discharge measurements, overflow, sediment observations, and profiles.

Although not completed, the work has progressed so far as to convince the engineer in charge, Major Casey, that the work is entirely feasible, and he has furnished us a plan for the canalization of the beds of said rivers and tributaries at times of low water by the construction of 13 locks and movable dams, each lock to have 5.6 feet lift, with guard of 3.2 feet, and to be 49.3 feet wide and 394 feet long between quoins, and to cost per lock and dam, including site, lock house, miscellaneous and contingent expenses, $275,000, or a total for the whole river and tributaries of $3,575,000; and he adds "that any revision of the estimate will be in the direction to lessen cost." The water supply is four times greater than the greatest demand.

Captain Marshall, in his report on the physical condition of the Ouachita, says:

The fall from Camden, Ark., to mouth of Black River at time of low water, 73.8 feet, gives a gentle average slope for the 350 miles, of course not uniform, being steeper in the upper and flatter in the lower part; besides that, it is more or less concentrated at the shoals, with depths as small as 0.6 foot, and long, almost level pools, with depths as great as 65 feet; the depth generally averages from 6.5 feet in the upper end to 16 feet in the lower; the width at low water varies from 65 feet to 541 feet, and bed measured between top banks from 295 feet to 820 feet; the width at canal water line would be from 262 feet to 656 feet; the banks are low in some localities, but generally they are above overflow, except when flooded by water from the Mississippi; they are usually composed of clay, and do not cave; the water carries from 21 to 150 grains of sediment in a million grains of water, being usually very clear; the material en train is sand and gravel on the shoals and mud in the pools; some of the shoals are rocky; these are almost ideal features for a canalized river.

I risk nothing in saying that the Government has undertaken no public improvement that has been more thoroughly considered than this one. The engineer who made the first survey in 1871, the board of engineers that reviewed the work, Captain Benyaurd, who made the resurvey; Major Willard, who seven years ago commenced the last survey; Major Casey, who now has the work in charge, and the Chief of Engineers all agree that the river can be made continuously navigable by locks and dams.

The time and money spent in making the plans and estimates and the ability, character, and standing of the engineers who have worked them out leave no doubt as to the practicability of the project, and so we answer upon the authority of these distinguished engineers that the improvement can be made.

From the standpoint of benefits to accrue to the commerce of the valley, let us see if

THE IMPROVEMENT SHOULD BE MADE.

This beautiful and ideal river and its tributaries affect 10 counties in South Arkansas and 11 parishes in North Louisiana, with an area of nearly 16,000 square miles, an extent of territory nearly twice as large as Massachusetts, and upon which there is a population of nearly 400,000. With less than one-tenth of the and in cultivation, the farmers residing there produced last year 200,000,000 pounds of cotton for export and 400,000,000 pounds of cotton seed, nearly all of which must be hauled to railroads and then shipped at low-water railroad rates.

It is estimated that in cotton and cotton seed the shippers of that valley pay annually $550,000 for outgoing freight—more than they would have to pay with the proposed improvement completed. This valley is indeed one of the richest cotton-growing countries in the world. It produces the longest staple cotton of which we have any knowledge, except the sea island, and is eagerly sought after by the New England and other spinners for the manufacture of fine goods.

There are located on these rivers and in the counties affected by this improvement about 50 of the most progressive, thoroughgoing towns of from 1,000 to 5,000 population, with an aggregate active business capital of over $7,000,000, and of an annual commercial business of over $20,000,000, to carry on which business the incoming freight charges are estimated to be over $1,700,000. With this improvement these charges would be reduced at least one-third.

The engineer's report shows that there are 36 steamboats, with tonnages from 665 tons down and with drafts when loaded from 5 to 2 feet, plying said river, which for five years past have carried an annual commerce of over $5,000,000.

This commerce consists of merchandise coming in from New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and New Orleans, and of cotton and lumber going out.

We are not asking for the improvement of rivers not navigable and upon which there is no commerce.

I am prepared to demonstrate by difference in railroad freight charges during low and high water periods the advantages to the shippers of that great valley.

I present here a table made up from freight bills actually paid last year at Camden, showing this difference and the saving per hundredweight when the river is navigable.

Comparative table of railroad and water rates.

Point of shipping.	Kind of goods.	Destination.	Railroad rates.	Water rates.	Saved by water transport.
South Ashburnham, Mass.	Fur	Camden, Ark	*$1.65	*$0.65	$1.00
Boston, Mass	Shoes	do	*2.02	*.79	1.23
Baltimore, Md	Cotton overalls	do	*1.56	*.79	.77
New Orleans, La	Domestics	do	*1.18	*.51	.67
Do	Staple groceries	do	*.70	*.30	.40
Do	Sugar, molasses, and rice	do	*.70	*.25	.45
Do	General dry goods	do	*1.15	*.50	.65
New York, N. Y	Rope and binders' twine	do	*1.10	*.50	.60
New Orleans, La	Cotton goods	do	†3.70	†1.00	2.70
Camden, Ark	Cotton	New Orleans	†3.10	†1.50	1.60
St. Louis, Mo	Flour	Camden, Ark	‡.75	‡.35	.40

*Per hundredweight. †Per bale. ‡Per barrel.

It shows that the saving by water per hundredweight from Boston to Camden on shoes is $1.23; from Baltimore on cotton goods, 77 cents; from New York on rope and twine, 60 cents; from New Orleans on cotton goods, $2.70, and from St. Louis on flour, 40 cents per barrel.

It also shows that the freight charges on cotton from Camden to New Orleans, our natural cotton market, by water is less than half of the railroad charges, or a saving of $1.60 per bale when the river is low.

When the river is navigable the railroads meet the water rates and the people get the benefits that come from low rates whether the commerce is by water or rail.

The manufacturers of yellow pine and hard woods in this valley, about equally divided between natives and those who have come from Northern States, shipped out last year 800,000,000 feet of manufactured lumber at a cost to the consumer of at least $800,000 more than it would cost if they had permanent navigation on these rivers. There is no section of our great and growing country where there are more progressive, wideawake, intelligent, and deserving people than the lumbermen of Ouachita Valley, and no part of the country with greater possibilities.

It is known that in these 21 counties and parishes there yet remains to be cut over 40,000,000,000 feet of the very choicest timber. Give us this improvement and thus enable the manufacturers to ship down these rivers to the Mississippi and then up that great river and its tributaries, and lumber will be reduced at least $1 per thousand in every lumber yard in the great Central West.

Nay, more, if you will permanently open these waterways to the sea they will undersell all other foreign countries in every country to the south of us or that can be reached by water, now or when the Nicaragua Canal has been completed. I have only spoken briefly of what has been done in a country that at the close of the civil war was absolutely bankrupt in purse, broken in spirit, with want, widowhood, and orphanage around every fireside, and yet the development and progress made even under these adverse conditions show that the savings that would come to the people even now residing there in freight charges for two years would complete the proposed improvement.

But, Mr. Chairman, we have not the one-fifth of the people or business that we will have before this enterprise can be completed, even if commenced at once and pushed as fast as we could expect.

Since locking and damming was first recommended for the Ouachita River this valley has doubled its population and quadrupled its business. Then it had no lumber mills except for the small local trade; now it has more than any territory of the same size in the United States.

While the Government has been investigating whether this great work should be undertaken private capital has built, at many times the cost of this improvement, two north-and-south railroads, one on either side of the river; and three east-and-west roads, one crossing at Arkadelphia, one at Camden, and the other at Monroe; and there are others in course of construction. And yet the hearings before the committee show that the railroads can not move the present tonnage in the valley.

On this river there are mountains of building stone and inexhaustible fields of coal and clay, as valuable as any known in the world.

I call attention to an analysis of the coal made by the United States Geological Survey.

TECHNICAL ANALYSIS.

In order to ascertain the gas-producing qualities of the Camden coal a quantity of it was shipped to the Pittsburg Testing Laboratory, Limited, of Pittsburg, Pa., for testing.

The test was run under the direction of a man familiar with practical gas manufacture.

The quantity of gas obtained per ton of 2,000 pounds of coal was 11,386 cubic feet of 22.3 candlepower.

The following table enables a comparison to be made between the Camden coal and other standard gas coals. The first six coals in the table were tested by the same apparatus under similar conditions, and the results are, therefore, strictly comparable:

No.	Character of coal.	Source of coal.	Cubic feet of gas per ton of coal.	Candlepower of gas.
1	Lignite	Camden, Ark	11,386	22.3
2	Bituminous	Washington County, Pa	9,880	16.9
3	do	do	9,920	16.1
4	do	do	10,120	18.36
5	Cannel	Beaver County, Pa	10,160	22.5
6	do	Kentucky	12,540	30.53
7	Bituminous	Upper Monongahela River (Pittsburg Gas Co.).	9,500-10,000	16
*8	do	Silkstone Seam, Yorkshire, England	10,000-10,000	15-17
*9	do	Newcastle, England (average 3 typical coals).	10,760	16.2
*10	do	South Yorkshire, England	11,000	17
*11	do	Derbyshire, England	10,500	15
*12	Cannel	Scotch cannel	12,350	31

*Thorpe Dictionary of Applied Chemistry, Vol. II.

It will be seen from this table that the Camden lignite is superior, both in yield and candlepower of gas, to the standard bituminous coals of Pennsylvania and England, and is inferior as a gas producer only to the best cannel coals.

These vast beds of coal and clay lying in juxtaposition are owned by capitalists from New Jersey, New York, and Pennsylvania, who are waiting for this improvement to begin extensive operations in the mining of coal and the manufacture of ornamental and vitrified brick.

Give them this improvement and they can reduce the price of coal and gas in every city on the Mississippi River or its tributaries.

So, Mr. Chairman, upon this showing of present and prospective commerce, I answer that it would be a good investment for the Government, and that the improvement should be made.

The proposition involved in my amendment does not appropriate for the whole improvement, nor does it commit the Government to the completion of the work, but is in line with the suggestion of the engineer in charge when he says:

> There would seem at least little to be urged against the construction of a few of the dams and locks, which would extend the low-water navigation some distance above its present upper limit in the river and afford a satisfactory test of the ultimate benefits to be derived.

In behalf of every waterways convention for seven years past, every commercial and legislative body of this great valley, I appeal to this committee to adopt this amendment and begin an improvement that, when completed, will free the farmers, merchants, miners, and manufacturers of a deserving section of our country from the extortion of railroads that they must submit to under present conditions. [Loud applause.]

Mr. CORLISS addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] is recognized in his own right for one hour.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, I represent a district that is more deeply interested in the navigation of the Great Lakes and other points on the coast than any other district in this country; yet we have no part of the "animal" embraced in the provisions of this great bill. Nature has supplied us with our necessities, and we can therefore look upon this subject from the standpoint of the impartial legislator, working for the best interests of the country.

It was not intended by our forefathers that the money belonging to the people, derived from taxation, should be distributed for the benefit of local interests. Any appropriation made for the advancement of commerce—beneficial to the people of the country—is wise and justifiable; but when you attempt, as has been done in this bill, and as has been done repeatedly in measures of this character for many years, to appropriate large sums of money for the upbuilding of some local interest, it is wrong, and such a system or method should stop.

As a neophyte on this floor, when I first observed these measures and regarded the wisdom that seemed to be displayed by the committee in charge thereof and the leaders upon the floor, I voted for such measures; and when I became convinced that the methods by which they were appropriating money was wrong and the distribution thereof unwisely made, I hesitated to take the stand I now do because my colleagues and the State that I have the honor in part to represent are deeply interested in this measure. No State in this Union has been benefited more than Michigan by such appropriation measures. They have enabled the commerce of the Great Lakes to be developed until the Detroit River carries the greatest tonnage that passes at any point of navigation in the world.

What I complain of, Mr. Chairman, is that instead of legislating and appropriating for the benefit of the commerce of our country exclusively you attempt in this measure to benefit local interests.

As the chairman of the committee said, the committee has evidently taken into consideration all of the local interests in distributing the appropriations made in the measure. In looking it over, it seems to me that this bill, aside from some great appropriations which are necessary, ought to be called "the liver and light bill," because I find more livers and lights exhibited than any other part of the animal.

Mr. Chairman, when an appropriation is made from the funds belonging to the people, it should be for the benefit of the people. I want to call attention to some of the items of this bill to illustrate the idea I wish to present and the criticism I desire to make. I wish to make no invidious distinctions; and I will call attention to the item of appropriation for the benefit of the Erie Basin at Buffalo—a purely local matter, of no benefit to the great commerce of the country. The people around that little basin will derive the entire benefit from the appropriation.

Two years ago $50,000 was appropriated to make a survey of the Erie basin at Buffalo. The survey was made and an estimate submitted showing the probable expense of making the improvement desired by the local interests in this basin. The estimate was less than $200,000. I have the estimate before me. The money was appropriated—the entire amount mentioned in the estimate of the engineer. Now, we must assume that the engineers making these estimates in the first instance knew what they were doing. But I find in this bill, on page 12, an additional appropriation of $200,000 and an authorization of a continuing contract for $614,643 in addition, carrying altogether nearly a million dollars for a local improvement for the express benefit of local interests.

That is one of the "important" improvements. Some members here, probably the members of the committee, regard that improvement as beneficial to the country because it is located at the end of navigation; but I desire to call attention to the fact that the harbor of Buffalo is amply sufficient outside of this basin for the great navigation and navigating interests of the lakes and rivers.

Permit me also to call attention to another item of this bill—an item found on page 10—for what is called the Buttermilk Channel, adjacent to New York City. We all know the vast sums of money that have been appropriated from time to time for improvements in that locality. Until New York Harbor is capable of taking care of the interests of our navigation at that great point, I would not object to our appropriating anything that contained a little cream for the people; but when it gets down to buttermilk it seems to me it is time to call a halt.

Now, what is Buttermilk Channel, as it is called in the bill? Mr. Chairman, this improvement is for the benefit of the property holders along the water front of Brooklyn, for the express benefit of their interests, and of no interest to the people at large in this country.

These are large items. It is better to take them for illustration and argument than to pick out some little appropriation for some little river that will not become a navigable stream during the life of this nation.

A few years ago, Mr. Chairman, looking to the interests of our country, Congress wisely passed a measure authorizing the President of the United States to appoint a commission of engineers to survey the Great Lakes and waterways from Duluth to New York, and a very large sum of money was appropriated for that purpose. Three of the most eminent engineers in this country were appointed to perform that work. Their reports are a part of the records of Congress, and it will appear, by an examination of them and of the act by which they were appointed, that the President was given power to secure, by diplomatic agreement, the right to establish the level of the water upon Lake Erie and tributary waters.

The Deep Waterway Commission, at the request of the Secretary of War, filed a preliminary report, which I have in my hand, which is Document No. 200, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session. In that they reported that in order to maintain the level of Lake Erie and tributary waters and secure a sufficient depth for navigation a regulating dam should be placed at the foot of Lake Erie. They submitted maps and estimates showing the cost thereof and the importance to navigation. It will appear upon an examination of these maps and estimates that the entire cost of this regulating dam will not exceed $1,000,000. It can be constructed within a year. It will not interefere in the slightest degree with the navigation above or below the dam. There is very little, if any, navigation below the proposed dam. The commissioners show conclusively that at least $1,000,000 of the money already appropriated by Congress would be saved to the people if the dam was built. Notwithstanding this report, disregarding the economy that might be secured thereby, the River and Harbor Committee, at the last session, appropriated additional money for the purpose of digging out the highway of commerce through the lakes, Lake Erie and its harbors, and the Detroit River.

Mr. Chairman, you can not raise the level of water by excavating from the bottom of the basin. That has been going on for many years, and at each excavation the natural level of the water has been lowered, until any engineer of ability who is familiar with the subject will admit that the only economical way to maintain the level of Lake Erie and assist navigation in the future is to raise the level by damming the water. If that is done, $1,000,000 appropriated in this bill is unnecessary. Why waste the money of the people in excavating where it is absolutely unnecessary when you adopt the regulating dam that is necessary to maintain the proper level for navigation in the future?

The committee have inserted, at page 84 of the bill, a paragraph to which I desire to call special attention. It is very short. I will read it.

SEC. 4. That the President of the United States is authorized, by diplomatic negotiation or otherwise, to enter into such agreements as will secure as far as possible the maintenance of suitable levels in the Great Lakes and connecting waters between the United States and Canada.

What does that mean? I should like to have the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors [Mr. BURTON] enlighten us. Does he not know that that law was passed by this Congress more than three years ago in the bill creating the Deep Waterways Commission? Does he not know that this provision is mere claptrap and does not amount to anything, and will not authorize the President to accomplish the object desired?

Can he secure an agreement with Canada by diplomatic correspondence that will affect the level of the great waterways of this country? If the chairman of the committee or the committee itself were sincere in desiring to carry out the wishes of these great engineers and the demands of commerce, they would put a provision in the bill that would authorize the President of the United States to call engineers to his aid and cooperate with like engineers of Canada, who are ready and anxious to secure a level that will benefit them as well as us in Lake Erie and the rivers tributary thereto. If you will raise the level of Lake Erie as is proposed by these engineers, one-half the appropriation now made in this bill for the harbor of Cleveland will be saved to the public purse. I can not understand such methods. Why will this committee go on and appropriate money to excavate where it is inevitable, if we can rely upon the testimony of the best engineers of the country, that such excavations will become unnecessary when a dam is erected?

Permit me again to call attention to the Detroit River, the fairest stream in the world, upon the banks of which I reside. The people of Detroit are deeply interested in navigation. Just below the city of Detroit, running across the bottom of the river, is a ledge of limestone rock, which makes what is known as the Limekiln Crossing, and a very large sum of money has been expended in excavating there. Yet the channel is only about 400 feet wide and very crooked. It ought to be widened, and an appropriation has been made to widen it; but if this dam is constructed, further excavations in the river at the Limekiln Crossing will be unnecessary. The water at that dangerous crossing will be raised 2 feet, and the necessary depth will be given to serve the interests of navigation. Every year we have harbored about the city of Detroit the great transportation steamers that traverse the lakes, which wait there because they can not cross the Limekiln Crossing in consequence of the fluctuation of the water from the effect of the winds. This regulating dam at the foot of Lake Erie will do away with that without any injury to anybody, and will save a million dollars already appropriated for the proposed improvement of this river.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. CORLISS. Yes.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. How much will your proposed dam raise the water at Wyandotte and Trenton?

Mr. CORLISS. The water at Wyandotte would be raised about 18 inches above low-water mark, but would not be raised a particle above high-water mark.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. That would flood much of that territory there, would it not?

Mr. CORLISS. The gentleman did not understand my proposition. The opinion of these engineers can not be questioned either by the gentleman or myself, and their statement is that this dam will raise the mean level of the water 2 feet above low-water mark and maintain it there without raising high-water mark an inch. Consequently the high-water mark at Wyandotte after the construction of the dam will not be one particle higher than it is now without the dam.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Is it not a fact that at high-water mark a good deal of that country is under water?

Mr. CORLISS. At high-water mark some portions of the land along the Detroit River and on Lake Erie are under water. But that condition of affairs has existed ever since white men have lived on the shores of those waters, and that condition of affairs will continue for all time. It is proposed by this dam so to regulate it as not to allow the water to overflow any more than it now does at high water, but the mean level would be maintained 2 feet higher than low-water mark now.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Do you not think that all the riparian owners between Buffalo and Chicago would have a claim against the Government for flooding their property?

Mr. CORLISS. On the contrary, if the water is not raised above what it now is at high water, how can they make any claim? And the engineers state, and give reasons that are absolutely conclusive to any man who will read them, that they will not raise the high-water mark a particle upon any of the waters that they propose to affect. I understand, Mr. Chairman, how it appears to a man who has not studied the question. It seems probable that if you raise the mean level of a body of water you would affect its high-water mark; but when you understand the proposition made by these eminent engineers, which no man with a knowledge of the subject has ever dared to question, you will understand that high-water mark will not be raised a particle. Therefore it does not affect the riparian interest in the slightest degree.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. CORLISS. Certainly.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. As a legal proposition, do you not think that the riparian owner has the right to have the low-water mark maintained during the season of low water?

Mr. CORLISS. I think not, where for a century it has been a well-known fact that these fluctuations have been going on, and the rights of the riparian owner have been acquired since the course of nature was established. A man has no legal right to demand the control of nature, and this does not propose to affect that in the slighest degree.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Is not the legal proposition this, that a man's riparian rights follow the advancing shore?

Mr. CORLISS. The gentleman is trying to discuss a proposition which is not involved in this question, and he either does not understand the position taken by the engineers or does not wish to comprehend the proposition that I have made.

Mr. BISHOP. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CORLISS. Let me answer my colleague [Mr. HENRY C. SMITH] first. I have simply stated that the regulating dam proposed will raise the level of the water on Lake Erie 2 feet above low-water mark and maintain that depth for navigable purposes. It will affect Lake Erie and the harbors of the Detroit River and Lake Huron and Lake Michigan in proportion to the stemming of the tide that flows down and the volume of the water that is necessary to regulate its height. It will not affect any property interests, because it will not raise the water at its highest period in the year in the slightest degree. Now I will yield to my colleague [Mr. BISHOP].

Mr. BISHOP. To what height do you propose to raise the water? I understand you to say 2 feet.

Mr. CORLISS. The engineers have recommended that an increase of 2 feet above low-water mark could be very wisely established for the benefit of navigation without interfering with riparian or other rights.

Mr. BISHOP. That would raise the entire surface of Lake Erie, would it not?

Mr. CORLISS. It would raise it, but not up to high-water mark. Lake Erie and the Detroit River at high-water mark are deep enough now, and this appropriation would be unnecessary if the depth of the water at the Limekiln crossing was always maintained at high-water mark.

Mr. BISHOP. Do you mean to be understood by the House as advocating a plan to raise the level of Lake Erie 2 feet?

Mr. CORLISS. Above low-water mark.

Mr. BISHOP. Above low-water mark, and maintain it there during the time of flood without raising it beyond that mark?

Mr. CORLISS. My dear man, if they have regulating dams they do not maintain it when the natural volume of water is great enough to raise it without artificial assistance.

Mr. BISHOP. Does not the gentleman understand it will take at least thirty days to reduce the head water in Lake Erie, in spite of his waste dams, during the time of high water?

Mr. CORLISS. I am surprised that a gentleman occupying the position he does on the Committee of Rivers and Harbors has not evidently read the voluminous reports that have been filed by the Deep Waterway Commission and the hearings that have been had before his own committee. He would not ask that question if he did understand the proposition made by the engineers.

Mr. BISHOP. If the gentleman wishes to get off on that point, all right. I can assure him that I have spent more time in reading that report than he has, and have heard all the arguments.

Mr. CORLISS. Possibly; and if you deemed it of the great importance that the best engineers of this country and navigable interests do, you would be advocating some provision in this bill that would give the navigable interests of the lakes an opportunity to secure an international agreement that would enable us to maintain the level of the lakes, and thereby advance the interests of commerce. But instead of that you appropriate money to still dig out from the harbor and the river that are rendered unnecessary, and would be absolutely unnecessary if this regulating dam was erected.

At the proper time, Mr. Chairman, I shall offer an amendment that will authorize the President of the United States to secure by international agreement some definite understanding by which the level of these waters can be established, and give him authority to use the information that has been acquired and confer with the engineers of Canada and our own engineers, so as to arrive at a definite conclusion and permit this great public work to go on.

Now, Mr. Chairman, permit me to call attention to one or two other items in this bill. I find on page 92 authority granted for the engineers to survey a part of the Hudson River—I assume for the purpose of advancing the commerce of our country. It does not explain or give any details or appropriate any money. It simply authorizes the expenditure of an unlimited amount, in the discretion of the Department, for this survey. The Hudson River at the point described has already been surveyed by the Deep Waterway Commission, and it is now before Congress as a document, showing just exactly what is asked for or can possibly be secured by this legislation.

This is simply a duplication of work already done by the Deep Waterway Commission. It is a scheme on the part of some one to ask the Government of the United States to assume a burden that is now being carried by the State of New York in her Erie Canal. It is an entering wedge that will finally end in fabulous appropriations by the Government for the benefit of local interests that are now controlled by the State of New York. It ought not to be permitted. Why? First, because the project is not of a national character, purely local; and second, the information desired is here for the examination of this body, by more eminent engineers than belong to the Army (and this is no disrespect to them), because this survey was made by Mr. Noble, of Chicago, Mr. Raymond, of the War Department, and Mr. Wisner, who has probably had greater experience with reference to the water of the lakes than any other civil engineer living. Their opinions can not be questioned and will not be questioned by any man who knows the subject. Therefore I say that item is wrong. It is a duplication, it is local in its character, and it ought not to be made.

I find another ingenious provision on page 69, where an appr - priation is made of $200,000 for the purpose of making surveys or investigations to determine the feasibility of improving the navigable water to the depth of 14 feet from Lockport, Ill., to the mouth of the Illinois River. Another entering wedge into the public Treasury for the benefit of a local interest, in which the people can never become interested, because you can never improve that highway so as to make it of any advantage to the commerce of this country; and when built, if it ever is, all of the products that would go down that narrow shallow way could be transported by rail for the interest upon the original cost of the enterprise.

It is wrong, because it attempts to impose upon the Government a private enterprise, not public in its character, of no earthly benefit to the general public, and, when once adopted, surveys come in, other appropriations are made, and millions of dollars—yes, hundreds of millions—would be necessary to make that project a success. Therefore I say, Mr. Chairman, these are a few of the glaring and more prominent mistakes in this measure. I do not expect that my remarks will have any effect. The liver and the lights have been properly distributed; Michigan, my Michigan, has got her part. Thank God for that! I really think that she has part of the ham, and hardly any of it is not wise from the standpoint of a Representative of Michigan.

I have tried to locate the different interests as I have read this measure, and I have endeavored not to point out any little appropriation that is simply permitted for the gratification of the member without benefiting the public, because I do not wish to make any invidious distinction, and I have located the point at Buffalo in which my friend here is interested because it is a large enterprise and he can justify it upon the ground of the Pan-American Exposition; that is some justification for the expenditure of this money. I have referred to the Buttermilk Channel because I know the great power of the Representatives of that State in reference thereto, and it will have no effect.

Mr. Chairman, there are other points I desire to make. No other country in this world appropriates from the public funds money for the benefit of local interests. Take England as an example. We all know of the Manchester Canal, where it is located, and that it cost $75,000,000. Not one dollar was appropriated out of the general fund of England. It was all paid by the local taxation upon the city of Manchester and her people. Take the river Clyde, which was a narrow stream, like many we are improving, and is now excavated at an enormous expense, so as to permit of the great freighters entering the city of Glasgow. Not one dollar of it was contributed by the Government. Every cent of it came from local assessment and taxation. How long will the people permit this pernicious system to go on?

Now, one other point. I find here a very wise provision appropriating a considerable sum of money for the improvement of the Sault Ste. Marie River. I think the appropriation and authorization by contract amounts to about $4,500,000. The chairman of this committee knows that the estimate made necessary to improve that river amounts to nearly $9,000,000; and it is important to the great public interests of this nation that it be made, that the improvement go forward, and that the improvement be made speedily. Why bite the cherry in two?

Mr. BURTON. Will the gentleman from Michigan permit an interruption?

Mr. CORLISS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURTON. Has the gentleman any information whatever as to how long it will require to complete that improvement?

Mr. CORLISS. Not positively.

Mr. BURTON. Has he investigated the subject of the time required to complete the contemplated improvement?

Mr. CORLISS. Somewhat.

Mr. BURTON. Would the gentleman favor carrying on the bill an appropriation or authorization beyond that which can be expended in four years?

Mr. CORLISS. I would appropriate in this bill and authorize whatever may be necessary to complete the enterprise by one contract, and thereby save a million dollars to the taxpayers. The chairman of this committee, if he will pardon me, knows that large sums of money are lost to the public because the contracts are not made covering the entire project at once.

Mr. BURTON. Does the gentleman think that if $4,500,000 is available for this work economical results can not be obtained?

Mr. CORLISS. I think the $4,500,000 might be economically expended, but it will not complete the work, and in order to do it you must pay a premium for additional contracts to complete it.

Mr. BURTON. Does the gentleman know that the War Department has expressly commended this course of not including the whole amount, in order that necessary modifications may be made when the contract is partly done, if on considering that part of the work it is thought desirable?

Mr. CORLISS. I know that the engineers of the Department have peculiar methods, some of which are most bitterly condemned by the best engineers of the country.

Mr. BURTON. In brief, is not the gentleman from Michigan speaking of something about which he is not very well posted?

Mr. CORLISS. If the chairman of the committee wishes to criticise the statement I am making, I am willing that he should. I am stating this as a general proposition, that when you have a public work involving the appropriation of millions of dollars, which will take two or three years to perform, it is wise to authorize the contract for the entire completion of that work based upon the estimate made.

Mr. BURTON. Is not the gentleman aware that he is in error in stating that these improvements will cost $9,000,000, when the fact is that the estimate amounts to only $5,750,000?

Mr. CORLISS. I have before me a communication signed by Colonel Lydecker, and I want to read the last paragraph, in order to show to my friend where I got my information:

> Summarizing the above, it appears that the total cost of securing such safe and convenient channel as is indicated by Congress will be in the neighborhood of $9,000,000, according to either of the projects herein suggested, and it is believed that no less radical improvement will meet the demands of the St. Marys River commerce. The estimated cost is to be taken as a maximum, and it is not unlikely that it may be materially reduced by further study of the complicated questions involved in the best final solution of the problem.

Mr. BURTON. Does not the gentleman from Michigan know that that involves a new lock at the Soo and the improvements of the channel above the Soo?

Mr. CORLISS. It does include a lock, which ought never to be built, because we have sufficient lock facilities, and by agreement with Canada we can use hers. I think there are expenses included there that ought not to go in.

Mr. BURTON. Then the gentleman from Michigan should revise his estimate of the total cost if he says there is included there something which ought not to be.

Mr. CORLISS. But the estimate is $5,750,000 for this improvement alone. Why leave a million dollars and more for some future time when this is one of the greatest improvements that could possibly be suggested for the advancement of the commerce of the country?

I call attention to these items because we are interested in advancing that character of legislation which benefits the State and the nation. It is not local in its character. It is national, and I submit that when legislation of that character is proposed you should not go halfway. You should appropriate for the entire project under one contract and thereby get the advantage of competition for the entire project.

Mr. Chairman, I have referred to this measure as the liver and lights bill with no intention of wounding the feelings of any member. I have not attempted to condemn any member's piece of liver, but think that some of them are salted unjustly and unwisely with the funds paid into the Treasury by the people. I have called attention to the glaring defects in the method, because I believe the time has come when we should change them.

Mr. Chairman, I will reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BISHOP obtained the floor and said: Mr. Chairman, after occupying a few minutes I will reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. Chairman, I did not intend and did not think it necessary for me to say anything in regard to this bill, thinking that the bill was so wise in its provisions that it would need no defense, particularly from a Michigan member. But since the gentleman representing the Detroit district [Mr. CORLISS] has seen fit upon this floor to attack the bill as well as to attack the motives of the gentlemen who framed it, it seems to me that it demands at least from a Michigan man a few words in reply.

It has seemed to me that among all the Michigan members or among all the members on this floor he should be the last to rise in his place and criticise this bill or criticise even the methods of creating it. I wish to say that while I have been on the Committee on Rivers and Harbors we have never sought at any time to favor any section or any State or any private enterprise. The only object and purpose of that committee from the very first has been to do absolute justice to the commerce of the country—nothing else.

Mr. CORLISS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BISHOP. Yes, sir.

Mr. CORLISS. Do you think that the improvement of a small river—an inland stream having, perhaps, a depth of 5 or 10 feet, that might possibly be raised to 14 feet in order to reach an inland town—is a benefit to the public at large?

Mr. BISHOP. State your proposition.

Mr. CORLISS. Answer the question.

Mr. BISHOP. Name some particular stream where we have done that particular kind of work.

Mr. CORLISS. I am not particularizing.

Mr. BISHOP. The gentleman can not particularize.

Mr. CORLISS. I am asking a hypothetical question.

Mr. BISHOP. It is easy for a member on this floor to get up and scold, when he has his motives in the failure to get something in the bill that he may have wanted; but when the gentleman will come down and particularize as regarding some particular stream where we have been unjust to him or to any locality, or have made an appropriation which we ought not to have made, then we shall have an opportunity of correcting it, but not when he makes a general statement or puts a hypothetical question.

Mr. CORLISS. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. BISHOP. Yes; certainly.

Mr. CORLISS. Have I suggested any appropriation for my district?

Mr. BISHOP. The gentleman has not asked for an appropriation for his district, because he has no navigable stream within it; but he has one of the finest streams in the United States running by it, which has done more than any other one thing to build up the city of Detroit.

Mr. CORLISS. That is right.

Mr. BISHOP. It has done more than any other one thing to add to her industries and her wealth, and the gentleman should be on the floor defending the bill rather than criticising it. He does not represent the interests of Detroit in saying what he has said about it. I do not believe the good people of Detroit will commend his action or commend his words. I know that there are great shipping interests in Detroit, and the people of that city are proud that Michigan stands among the foremost to-day in the great industries of this country and foremost in the great commerce that is now carried on her lakes, and I believe he is the only gentleman from Michigan who seeks to criticise the bill or will vote against it.

The animus, as I said a moment ago, undoubtedly comes from the fact that he has failed to get something in the bill that was a pet scheme of his; and judging from his remarks I should say it is the lake levels. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is true that a proposition of that kind was made to the committee, and fairly made. It was carefully considered, but it did not come to us in such a shape that an appropriation could be made in the present bill. As a matter of fact, when the question was considered by the committee, it was ascertained that by raising the waters of Lake Erie 2 feet very much of the adjacent country would be flooded; and there is not a lawyer or layman upon this floor who does not know that by so doing we would render the United States subject to damage suits to an extent almost unheard of. And until that matter can be disposed of we thought it not wise for the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to put the United States Government in the position of a defendant.

Mr. CORLISS. Will the gentleman permit another interruption?

Mr. BISHOP. Oh, certainly.

Mr. CORLISS. Why, then, did you not insert in this bill some provision that would give the President the right and clothe him with the authority to secure a diplomatic agreement, and not put in the bill just what has already been passed by Congress before, without giving him authority to act?

Mr. BISHOP. We think section 4 of the bill gives ample power to the President to appoint any such commission as he may desire.

Mr. CORLISS. Do you not know that the same thing is in the act passed three years ago creating the Deep Waterways Commission?

Mr. BISHOP. If the gentleman is not satisfied with the provision in section 4, let him prepare his amendment and let the committee vote upon it. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors have acted toward him in good faith. They have sought to carry out his wishes, and if they have failed he can appeal to the members of this House to correct the committee.

There is another thing in the gentleman's remarks that strikes me as very harsh. The gentleman calls it facetiousness. Now, that may be a very kindly thought of his, and very courteous to the committee, when he talks about liver and pork. I hardly think it necessary for me to attempt to defend the Committee on Rivers and Harbors before this House. Members of this House know the make-up of that committee, and so I do not feel called upon to say a word in defense of the committee against a slur of that kind. This bill is not made up in the way the gentleman seems to intimate. It is not made up on the idea of favoritism either to the members of the committee or to any section of the country.

The gentleman can go outside in the lobby and find the figures there presented by some other member of the House attempting to cast reflections on the committee, first by showing that the States represented by membership on that committee have received more of the appropriations than other States; but there is no member of the House who does not know that the Speaker in making up this committee selected its membership from the great States that are largely interested in commerce and transportation. That being true, it is quite necessary that we should make appropriations to the States that have the commerce. That is true of the great State of New York, with the harbors of New York and Buffalo, and the great rivers of that State. It is true of Michigan, with more than 1,500 miles of lake coast and more than 30 great ports. It is true of Michigan, because those lakes carry a commerce greater than that of any three of the great ports of Europe. We, of course, must take care of that commerce, and we have taken care of it only by making reasonable appropriations. Although the gentleman may seek to reflect upon that committee, the membership of this House will understand that we make appropriations where commerce is, and not where commerce is not.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it hardly seems to me as though it was necessary for me to speak regarding the level of Lake Erie, of which the gentleman from the Detroit district [Mr. CORLISS] has so bitterly complained. He proposes to raise the level of Lake Erie 2 feet. He thinks that will raise the water on the Limekiln Crossing, and thereby avoid the necessity of digging the channel deeper. The question asked by my colleague [Mr. HENRY C. SMITH] was very pertinent and to the point. Many of the great industries along the Detroit River would be flooded by any such action as the building of that dam. But the gentleman from the Detroit district [Mr. CORLISS] would have an automatic dam. There is to be plenty of water when you need it and less water when you do not need it. That is the gentleman's idea.

The gentleman should understand that if we build restraining works and raise the level of the lake we can not dispose of that water in a brief period of time. It will take a month to lower the level of Lake Erie with all the gates in the dam open. In the meantime a flood may come and do untold injury to the people living along the flat shores of the lake, and great industries whose plants are situated just outside of the First Congressional district and which are in the district of my friend to the south of him [Mr. HENRY C. SMITH] may be destroyed.

Mr. CORLISS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BISHOP. Yes; certainly.

Mr. CORLISS. Is it not true that the engineers to whom I have referred, one of whom, at least, appeared before the committee, stated that their plan of raising the lake level would not raise the high-water-mark level?

Mr. BISHOP. It would raise the water.

Mr. CORLISS. Did not the engineers so state—that the high-water mark would not be affected—and have they not so reported to your committee?

Mr. BISHOP. There was one engineer, a gentleman whose ability I greatly respect, who thought that restraining dams could be built in such a way that when they wanted less water they could let it out and that when they wanted high water they could raise it, but that was criticised by other engineers equally able. And if it were possible as an engineering project, what will you do with the damages to the land that would be overflowed by such raising of the lake? Until that is cared for this committee, at least in the present bill, could make no appropriation, and the gentleman knows enough to know it.

Mr. CORLISS. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. BISHOP. Certainly.

Mr. CORLISS. You admit that the engineers stated emphatically that their plan of damming Lake Erie would not raise the high-water level. Now, if it will not raise the high-water mark how on earth can it flood any land that is not now flooded at high-water mark?

Mr. BISHOP. If they raise it up to high-water mark, and the floods come in the Detroit River, before you can dispose of that water you have an overflow inevitably, and it will take at least thirty days to dispose of that water in Lake Erie. Further, the gentleman knows perfectly well that there is no project before the committee at this time upon which an appropriation could be made, and therefore his criticism is ill timed.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I am anxious to join the harmony among the members from Michigan. [Laughter.] The real fact is that by reason of this kind of harmony or the want of it among the members from Michigan, as I apprehend, there is an item in this bill which should not be there and which, when the time comes, I shall move to strike out. It is found on page 65 of the bill, and provides for an appropriation of $500,000 for the construction of Plan A, referred to in House Document No. 712.

Now, there are three channels in the Detroit River opposite Ecorse, Wyandotte, and Trenton. One is the Canadian channel, which is classed in this report as Plan A. This is the channel on the Canadian side. That is what I object to. I object to the American Congress spending more money to construct, to enlarge, and to maintain a ship channel on the borders of Canada. In the early days the channel was along the American side, extending from Trenton clear up to the city of Detroit. But, for certain reasons which I can not fathom, of late the money has been appropriated for and the channel has been changed over to the Canadian side, where the bottom is all rock, where it has to be blasted out at large expense, and where boats get across the channel and impede navigation.

And I ask gentlemen to read report 712, in which it will be seen that the engineer has made his estimates, wherein he claims it will only take about $2,000,000 more to complete, according to this plan, the channel on the Canadian side. It will cost about $10,000,000, according to his statement, to complete the central channel between the two, and he estimates that it will take $13,000,000 to complete the American channel and make it what it should be. But I respectfully call attention to the fact that these are only estimates. They are stated to be estimates, and I am unable to find that any survey or any soundings have ever been made as a basis upon which this estimate is made.

And I want to say, further, that the engineer or the assistant engineer who makes this report, Mr. Dickinson, as I am informed, lives in Amherstburg, Canada, right across the river from Wyandotte. His property is there, and my constituents in Wyandotte advise me that they have never had an opportunity to have any conference with him or opportunity to make any statements to him. Before the Canadian channel was opened there were three shipyards in Trenton at the south end of the island. When the Canadian channel was built up these shipyards perished. Within the last three years a shipyard of considerable importance has been built up at Wyandotte. This engineer made no report in favor of any assistance to the harbor at Wyandotte, but I will say in behalf of the committee, all the members of which have been very courteous to me, that they have not neglected that matter.

I want to say further that those who know Colonel BISHOP know that he needs no defense as to his honor, his ability, or his integrity on the floor of this House. I went to the committee, and when I explained to them the conditions they authorized an appropriation, which is in this bill, which is satisfactory and which will assist the harbor at Wyandotte so that the shipyard may be used. But I want to submit this: It has been stated here that 35,000,000 tons of freight pass through the Detroit River every year; that six times as great a tonnage passes through that river as through the Suez Canal. I will not be outdone by my brother from the First district [Mr. CORLISS] in my praise and my love for my beloved State of Michigan, but I do want to submit that the facts show that the city of Wyandotte, in the district which I have the honor to represent, is the third city in the State of Michigan in the amount of freight handled, the cities in their relative importance as to the amount of freight handled being Detroit, Grand Rapids, and Wyandotte.

In the latter city there originates every year more than one million and a half tons of freight, or about one-thirtieth as much as passes through the entire Detroit River. And I want to say that there is no boat of any kind which ever stops at Wyandotte to get one ton of that freight. This $20,000,000 spent on our Great Lakes is spent for the benefit of four cities—Chicago, Duluth, Cleveland, and Buffalo. Now, I submit that if we are legislating for the general good of the greatest number, some provision should be made whereby boats might touch the wharves at Wyandotte; that could gather up the million and a half tons of freight that originates there every year.

There is no competition there either. There is the Michigan Central Railroad, and what they call the Lima Northern, a little road 80 miles long, which starts nowhere and ends nowhere as an independent line, something like the railroad spoken of by the chairman of this committee as one of Jules Verne's dreams. Having been one of the promoters of the Detroit and Lima Northern Railroad, I do not want to give it a black eye, but it is said that its initials D. & L. N. stand for "Dead and Left Nothing." [Laughter.] While it has done somewhat to relieve the shippers of our district it has not accomplished the purpose indicated in the report of the engineer, who had under investigation the conditions of the Detroit River at these points.

But really it affords no real, substantial competition. I only speak of it because this report says my constituents have ample shipping facilities and full competition with the Lima Northern and the Michigan Central railroads. I know that the Michigan Central is a great system, and by the courtesy of the committee, when it went through the Wyandotte Channel, I was invited to be its guest, and with that committee was the general attorney of the Michigan Central Railroad. For what purpose? It was not a day that he went for pleasure in the rain; but he was there with the committee. I asked one of the members of the committee why he was there, and he said he did not know. [Laughter.] What I am submitting is this: My constituents are left absolutely at the mercy of the Michigan Central Railroad.

Mr. KLUTTZ. May I interrupt the gentleman one moment?

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Yes, sir.

Mr. KLUTTZ. I desire to ask him if it is one of the legitimate purposes of this bill to furnish competition to the shipping interests of the large cities of the country?

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. I supposed it was for the general interest of the shipping. If I am wrong I should be glad to be put right. I did not suppose it was for the benefit of the great ship owners and boat owners of this country. I will admit, however, that those great boats have pretty nearly driven the small boats from the lakes up in my country.

Now, I have not, Mr. Chairman, attained that advance in science where I can contemplate the science of the dam proposed by the able Representative of the First district of Michigan. I can not conceive how a dam can be constructed or a breakwater, at Buffalo, which will raise the water 18 inches at Wyandotte when the water is low and will not raise it at all when the water is high. [Laughter.] That is one of those paradoxes that is only equaled by the result of the bill we passed yesterday concerning Colorado. It is a paradox, if any such thing could exist. Let me submit this: In Wyandotte we have one concern that makes 300 tons of its product and ships it every day. It burns 500 tons of coal and 200 tons of coke every day. There are 57 salt wells there, too. These salt wells yield, on an average, 300 barrels of salt every day. If the water at high-water mark or low-water mark were raised 18 inches it would destroy them, and if we should pass a law which destroyed that property, as a legal proposition, I submit we would be bound to pay for it.

In addition to that, if you raise the water by a dam of this kind it would not only flood a great part of my district, but a large part of the low country between Buffalo and the city of Detroit, about Toledo and all those cities, filling up the sewers, flooding the streets, filling the wells, and the damage could not be estimated. So thus far I am in harmony with the committee in this proposition. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the rest of my time.

Mr. BALL. Will the gentleman from Michigan, before he takes his seat, give the balance of the committee a certificate of character as well as Colonel BISHOP?

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Every man in Michigan is all right, except one who lived in Texas once. [Laughter.]

Mr. BALL. I mean the balance of the River and Harbor Committee.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Oh, yes; certainly. I have done so already.

[Mr. SCUDDER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. ADAMS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. CUNNINGHAM, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 13394) providing for the payment of electoral messengers.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nevada is recognized for twenty-five minutes.

[Mr. NEWLANDS addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise for the purpose of opposing the bill of the committee, but simply to indicate an amendment that I will offer at the proper time. I now ask unanimous consent that my amendment be sent to the Clerk's desk and be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be read in the gentleman's time.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes; read in my time.

Strike out lines 12, 13, and 14 and substitute therefor the following:

"Improving Tennessee River at Colbert Shoals: Continuing improvement, $300,000: Provided, That a contract or contracts may be entered into by the Secretary of War for such materials and work as may be necessary to complete Lock and Dam No. 1, and to construct Lock and Dam No. 2, at Colbert Shoals, to be paid for as appropriations may, from time to time, be made by law, not to exceed in the aggregate $1,000,000, exclusive of the amount herein and heretofore appropriated."

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I am very grateful to the distinguished chairman of the committee [Mr. BURTON] for his courtesy and kindness in allowing me fifteen minutes to speak on this subject. I am to speak on the Tennessee River, which is fifteen hundred miles long, and as I have fifteen minutes, that allows me one minute to each hundred miles. Hence it becomes very necessary for me to concentrate my views and my remarks upon one single point of that river—Colbert Shoals—which my amendment discloses.

I was especially gratified, Mr. Chairman, when the war-revenue bill was under discussion before this House before the recess, to hear the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] state that he favored a liberal and generous appropriation to Colbert Shoals on the Tennessee River. It was a broad, liberal, patriotic, and national spirit that prompted that remark, because the gentleman knew the importance of that place in our river. And I hope, Mr. Chairman, that that distinguished gentleman believes with me this evening, that now is the accepted time to render his aid and his help in our behalf.

There is no question, Mr. Chairman, and no subject that can probably arise before this House in which the people whom I have the honor to represent on this floor are more interested and more concerned than they are in the improvements of the Tennessee River. Every county in the district that I represent borders on the one side or the other of this great stream—more than 200 hundred miles in distance—embracing what is known as the fertile and beautiful valley of the Tennessee, a valley that Commodore Maury, years ago, said would yet be, in the course of years, the most densely populated section of the American Union, outside of the great centers of population. He said: "Why, the Tennessee River will be made navigable, and then you will be tapped in this valley by railroads from all directions, and enterprises will dot the sides of the river from the eastern boundary of Alabama to its western boundary."

And I am glad, Mr. Chairman, to say to-day that the prophecy of that wonderful man is in part realized in that valley, and we only await now the generous hand of the Government to reap all of the fruits of the prophecy.

The amendment that I propose to offer at the proper time is intended to carry out what I believe to be the purposes of the River and Harbor Committee in the near future as to what they will do in the matter of appropriations for Colbert Shoals. I do not say that from any personal information that has been given me by any member of that committee, but I base the statement upon the incontestable facts of record that I propose to submit for the consideration of this committee.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that part of the river and harbor bill which I propose to amend recites that "the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to prepare an estimate of cost of improving said river at Colbert Shoals by locks and dams." On the 2d day of August, 1899, a report was made and filed in the War Department by one of the ablest engineers in this country, the chief engineer in charge of the improvements of the Tennessee River. He made an elaborate survey, estimate, and investigation of the cost and expense that would enter into the matter of improving the Tennessee River at Colbert Shoals by locks and dams.

That report was filed on the 2d of August, 1899. What was that estimate? It was that the lock and dam system, by practical use of the improvements that have already been made at the lower lock on Colbert Shoals, would cost $1,433,850. That is the testimony of an able, experienced, skillful man, who ranks high as an engineer. What we ask, Mr. Chairman, was the estimate of cost and expense that he made in this report for the lateral-canal system at Colbert Shoals. The estimate of cost, in which he included the cost of the canal of earth embankment, was $2,748,722. The other estimate, relating to the lateral-canal system, which was for rock or masonry for the wall of the canal, was $3,017,122.

Thus I present, Mr. Chairman, the actual ascertained and established difference in the matter of expense or cost between the plan of improving the Tennessee River at Colbert Shoals by locks and dams and the plan of a lateral canal, the former indorsed and recommended by the chief engineer who is now and has been for years past in charge of the improvements of the Tennessee River, the latter plan—the lateral canal—indorsed and recommended by two competent engineers, appointed, together with the chief engineer in charge, to inquire into that matter.

What is the difference that the engineer in charge of the improvements of the Tennessee River makes between the lock-and-dam system and the lateral canal? In the one, that of earth embankment, it is $1,300,000 difference; in the other, the rock-wall system, it is $1,600,000 difference. There is the matter presented in a nutshell—that is to say, if the committee adopts the lock-and-dam plan it will effect a saving to the Government of either $1,300,000 or $1,600,000. Why, I ask, and I ask it in all seriousness, with the report of the chief engineer in charge of the river making this difference in favor of the lock-and-dam system over the lateral-canal plan, was the lock-and-dam plan not accepted?

Why, Mr. Chairman, two years ago this very same question came up, and Colbert Shoals was told that it must stand aside and wait, because there was a difference between the engineers on the lateral-canal system and the lock-and-dam system. We were asked to wait, and we patiently have done so; and to-day, in this report of the committee, we are confronted with the same thing. We are asked to wait two years longer, until the Rivers and Harbors Committee can have another survey and estimate made for locks and dams at Colbert Shoals.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not complaining of the River and Harbor Committee. I imagine that it is just as difficult to arrange a river and harbor bill as to arrange an apportionment bill between the States. But these are the facts before us. I am not here contending, nor have I contended, nor have the friends of the Tennessee River contended, for either one plan or the other. All that we have asked is that an appropriation commensurate with the importance of Colbert Shoals be made on the one plan or the other. It is proper for me to say I have in my hands and I read, Mr. Chairman, from the Annual Report on the Improvement of the Tennessee River and its Tributaries for the year 1900, made by Maj. Dan C. Kingman, chief engineer in charge of the improvements of the Tennessee River:

On the 2d of August, 1899, I submitted a report suggesting a modification of the plan of improvement adopted for Colbert Shoals. It is a modification or substitution of a slack-water system for the lateral canal system, utilizing the work already done and employing two closed dams across the river instead of a canal.

The proposed modification was submitted to a board of engineers composed of Major Kingman and two others, and the decision of this board was that it was best to adhere to the lateral canal system.

I propound this question to the distinguished chairman of the River and Harbor Committee: Which plan does his committee indorse? Surely it has rejected the lateral canal plan, because in its bill it directs the Secretary of War to prepare estimates for a lock and dam system; and no reasonable, sane man can think for a moment that if the Secretary of War prepares or has prepared the items of cost and expense for a lock and dam system that (unless the committee in its personnel should entirely change in the next two years) it would make a generous appropriation to Colbert Shoals and place it where its importance requires—on the continuing-contract system. Then, if they do that, and there is literally no other rational conclusion to be reached, why can not they allow this amendment, Mr. Chairman, to be made right now and relieve us of unnecessary delay?

I say, Mr. Chairman, with entire respect, that it appears to me that the attitude of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors toward Colbert Shoals is that of procrastination. The lateral canal plan recommended by a majority of the board of engineers is rejected by the committee and they decline to act on the careful, exhaustive, and elaborate estimate of the cost of the lock and dam system submitted by Major Kingman, the chief engineer in charge of the Tennessee River. It is then manifest in the face of this seeming conflict the only hope for immediate relief that the friends of Colbert Shoals have is in Congress. The distinguished chairman, Judge BURTON, in reply to a question that I propounded to him during this debate, said in reference to the report of the chief engineer in charge of the Tennessee River:

There may have been some such estimate made, but it has never come before us officially. We can not take into account reports that are lodged in the Engineer's Office.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Was it not filed in the office of the Chief Engineer?

Mr. BURTON. That, however, does not bring it before us even if it were. I telegraphed the Chief of Engineers and asked for it, and he said it had never been published.

The report, Mr. Chairman, was very accessible. It was on file in the War Department and was kindly handed me at my request. The same report is referred to in the "Annual report upon the improvement of Tennessee River and its tributaries, in charge of Dan C. Kingman, major, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, for 1900."

The improvement of a river or a portion of a river by means of locks and fixed dams is no new thing in this country or in Europe. The fact is that our best and most successful improvements on fresh-water rivers have been accomplished by locks and fixed dams. In reading the history of the Tennessee River I find that the lock and dam system was adopted many years since as the most efficient for the improvement of Colbert Shoals. On this subject I ask permission to read from the report of the chief engineer in charge of Tennessee River, made on August 2, 1899, to Brig. Gen. John M. Wilson, Chief of Engineers, United States Army, Washington, D. C.:

The act of Congress of March 2, 1837, made the first appropriation for a survey of Colbert Shoals, and following this efforts were made to secure the improvement of these shoals, first, by sluicing, so called, and second, by the construction of a lateral canal. But actual work upon these shoals was put aside in order that the proposed improvements might be continued at Mercer Shoals, and it was not until 1888 that a definite plan for the radical improvement of Colberts and Bee Tree shoals was formulated. This was the plan prepared by Lieutenant Waterman, under the immediate direction of Colonel Barlow, for the improvement of Colberts and Bee Tree shoals by the method of locks and dams.

This project was never approved, and there is no record that it was ever formally disapproved, but it was changed by Colonel Barlow to a project consisting of locks and longitudinal dams in the bed of the river itself. The board of engineers heretofore referred to in considering the question of improvement of Colbert and Bee Tree shoals appeared to give but little consideration to the method of improvement by cross dams and locks. The subject was dismissed in a paragraph with the statement that it was "inexpedient to interfere with the free and unobstructed navigation of the open river, which is practicable during a large portion of the year."

The board stated, however, that "if a slack-water improvement of the main channel of the river was decided practicable and advisable its cost would undoubtedly be much less than the cost of the proposed canal." This statement of the board as regards the cost is undoubtedly correct, and for this reason alone I was first led to give careful consideration to the subject of the slack-water improvement. The lower lock, which has already been constructed, might, with very slight modification, be used as well in connection with the slack-water improvement as with the lateral canal, so that all of the work actually done would now be available for either project, but it is not practicable to proceed any further with the work of construction without having finally fixed upon one plan or the other.

Mr. Chairman, nearly three-quarters of a century have passed since the attention of our Government was first given to the improvement of Colbert Shoals, and yet in the face of this fact we are now asked by the Rivers and Harbors Committee "to wait yet a while" and possess our souls in patience, for sooner or later our hopes and expectations may be realized. The total amount expended on the Tennessee River to June 30, 1899, as shown by the annual report heretofore referred to, is $4,650,057.94. Out of this large amount $3,181,736.50 has been expended in the completion of Big Muscle Shoals and Elk River canals and their approaches. The total amount expended on Colbert Shoals is $652,731.35. With permission, Mr. Chairman, I will now read an extract on page 2914 of the annual report upon the improvement of the Tennessee River, heretofore referred to:

3. Decatur, Ala., to Florence, Ala. (50 miles).

The principal obstructions upon this section of the river are the Mercer Shoals, extending from deep water at Browns Ferry to deep water at Florence (38 miles), and embracing Elk River Shoals, Big Muscle Shoals, and Little Muscle Shoals. Only 8 miles of this distance of 38 miles is navigable in its natural condition. The Elk River Canal, a mile and one-half long, having two locks, with lifts of 12 feet, and from 8 to 11 feet, respectively, overcomes the obstruction at Elk River Shoals. The Big Muscle Shoals Canal, originally built for the United States by the State of Alabama, which was completed in 1836 and practically abandoned in 1837, overcame the obstruction of the Big Mercer Shoals.

This canal was subsequently repaired by the United States, its locks remodeled, enlarged, and given increased lifts, whereby their number was diminished and the whole completed in 1890. An attempt was made to overcome the difficulty of navigation on Little Mercer Shoals by channel work, but the fall is too great, and the limit of the improvement was reached without satisfactory results. The project has since provided for the construction of a canal 15,000 feet long, with a guard lock at the head and a lift lock at the foot having a lift of 12 feet, to overcome this obstruction.

The Big Muscle Shoals and the Elk River Shoals divisions of the canal permit navigation through them at all stages of the water. Between these two canals there is a stretch of water about 8 miles long, which still offers a number of obstructions to navigation. A good deal of work has been done here, but in their present condition these obstructions are sufficient to stop navigation between the two divisions of the canal, even before extreme low water is reached.

I am anxious, Mr. Chairman, to see all of the obstructions at Muscle Shoals and elsewhere on the river speedily removed, but it is manifest that it will take years to accomplish this. What we are asking for now, and what we want and need, is an appropriation sufficient to produce immediate results. If Congress will give us enough money to remove the obstructions at Colbert Shoals, a wonderful impulse will at once be given to trade progress and development in that section, which will be most gratifying to all the people of the country. The great misfortune, I think, is that the work was not commenced and the money expended on the lower part of the river and continuing upstream.

I do not wish to be understood as saying that no commercial benefits or results have been realized from the appropriations heretofore made for the improvement of the river. But I do say that if the amount asked for in my amendment is appropriated, in two years we will see a tenfold increase in the commercial results compared with what have already taken place. Mr. Chairman, we have large iron industries located at Sheffield and Florence, with two or more of the largest cotton factories in the South at the latter place. These cities are 8 miles below the Muscle Shoals and 22 miles above Colberts Shoals and are two of the most prosperous cities of our State.

On the repeated promises that have been made to us for years past of sufficient appropriations for the removal of obstructions at Colbert Shoals, I personally know that millions of dollars have been invested in the localities I refer to above. I say, and say it with earnestness, that it is not fair and just to these enterprising, energetic, and thrifty people, who have invested their money on these expectations and promises created and made by Government engineers and Congressmen, to postpone this matter of relief for two years longer, to await the myth of another survey and estimate of cost.

Why, Mr. Chairman, all the surveys that can be conjured or concocted will never change or alter the indisputable fact that the improvement of Colbert Shoals is of paramount necessity. Another survey is simply a useless expense and an unnecessary consumption of time. I am not able to present a real picture of what I believe the increased prosperity would be as the result of the opening of Colbert Shoals. A distinguished friend of mine, Maj. A. W. Wills, of Nashville, Tenn., who for years has given his hand, his heart, and his indomitable energy to this great work, very aptly said in the remarks that he was permitted to make recently on this subject before the Rivers and Harbors Committee:

Again, the number of additional manufactures of every conceivable kind that would be attracted to that section and, in fact, all along the line of the river should not be lost sight of. New Orleans is the natural point along the entire Alantic coast for exporting iron, because of the tramp steamers in which pig iron is principally exported. Now, permit me, please, to emphasize the most important items in a commercial or financial sense in connection with the matter being considered. Iron can be barged from Sheffield and Florence to New Orleans at $1 per ton against an all-rail rate of $3 per ton, taking the capacity of the present six furnaces (1,200 tons daily), a saving in freight alone of $2,400 per day. It might be asked why iron is not barged to New Orleans at present.

I answer because of the condition of the Colbert Shoals. Even in high water it is dangerous to load more than 300 tons on a barge, and in this quantity it would not pay to barge iron such a distance. We have at times barged iron over the shoals for shipment to Chicago and Western points from Brooklyn on the Ohio River via the Illinois Central Road, but only in small barge loads, because of the dangers cited above. To make the work profitable we must have continuous navigation whereby we can use large barges and have them made specially for the trade. I have referred above to iron and other articles barged to New Orleans for export. Of course, if our river is improved the same rule holds good for shipment of iron, coal, etc., down the Tennessee and distributed to all Western and other points via the Ohio, Mississippi, and other rivers.

Let the Colbert Shoals obstructions be removed and you will find millions of tons of coal from the great Warrior coal fields finding its way to the Gulf and to the South American countries. You will find new furnaces, rolling mills, and all conceivable kinds of manufactories taking root along the Tennessee. The immense timber, cotton, agricultural, phosphate, and other interests of that great section will come to the front. The Tennessee River will be found dotted from its source to its mouth with all kinds of transports and water craft, and peace and prosperity will reign supreme.

The above are the views of one of the brainiest and most prominent Republicans of the South—a man who has identified himself with the commercial development of the South. I have no hesitancy, Mr. Chairman, in stating that no section of the South to-day presents a more inviting field for profitable investment and is receiving greater accessions to its population than the valley of the Tennessee from Stevenson to Cherokee, Ala. Industries and enterprises of all kinds are coming to us and locating among us from one end of the valley to the other. In the city of Huntsville, where I have the pleasure of residing, we have recently located the seventh cotton factory, and other factories have been located at Scottsboro, Athens, Florence, and one or more other places.

Our people are not repining over the past, recent or remote, but they are buoyant and hopeful of the future. Thousands of most excellent and worthy people from the North and the West are making their homes with us, attracted by our healthy climate, our fertile and cheap lands, and the generous cordiality and welcome of our people. And I say now if Congress will "add unto us" the free navigation of the Tennessee River, our joy will be complete and our prosperity will be assured.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I would like, Mr. Chairman, to have the consent of the House to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. And to include the report of the engineer that I have been speaking of.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. DALZELL having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HOPKINS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 13189, and had come to no resolution thereon.

RECALL OF BILL FROM PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to lay before the House the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to return to the Senate the bill of the Senate 1296, granting an increase of pension to George G. Kemp.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the resolution will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

SENATE BILL AND RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill and resolutions of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. R. 149. Joint resolution providing for the distribution of compiled statutes of the District of Columbia to judges of United States courts—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Senate concurrent resolution 89:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish Congress with a report showing the present condition of the breakwater at Burlington, Vt., with an estimate of cost for its proper repair and completion—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that members who address the committee on this bill may have leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that members addressing the House on the pending measure have leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. STEELE. Confining their remarks to the subject under consideration, otherwise I object.

Mr. BURTON. I will modify my request so that it shall be that they confine their remarks to the subject under consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Provided that their remarks be confined to the subject under consideration. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURTON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia submitting an estimate of appropriation for rent of building in the District of Columbia—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 10, 1901.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

AGRICULTURAL AND MECHANICAL COLLEGES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report of the disbursements for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, made in the States and Territories of the appropriation in aid of colleges of agriculture and the mechanic arts; which, with the accompanying paper, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

FRENCH SPOLIATION CLAIMS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting the findings of fact and of law filed under the act of January 20, 1885, in the French spoliation claims relating to the vessel snow Jenny, Hugh Lyle, master; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—VOTE TO TABLE AMENDMENT.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I wish to make a personal statement, with the consent of the Senate. I was called out of the Chamber yesterday and was unavoidably detained when the vote was taken upon the amendment of the committee to the Army bill called the canteen amendment. If I had been present, I should have voted in the negative and to sustain the action of the committee. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President, I desire also to state that I was absent yesterday when the vote in question was taken upon the canteen amendment. Had I been present, I should have voted to sustain the action of the committee.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the resolution of the Senate requesting the President to return to the Senate the bill of the Senate (S. 1296) granting an increase of pension to George G. Kemp.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ALLISON presented the petition of John T. Faulds and 72 other citizens of Ottumwa, Iowa, praying for the enactment of legislation to regulate the hours of daily labor of workmen and mechanics, and also to protect free labor from prison competition; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. PERKINS presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of San Diego, Cal., praying for the adoption of certain amendments to the interstate-commerce law; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. CLAY. I present a joint resolution of the legislature of Georgia in favor of an appropriation for deepening the river and for the improvement of the harbor at Savannah. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution by Mr. Hitch, of Chatham County.

Whereas the city of Savannah, an important seaport of this State, through its city council, its various commercial and trade organizations, and its citizens generally, is making a strong and earnest effort to secure an appropriation from the Congress of the United States for the deepening of the river and harbor at that place from 26 to 28 feet at mean high tide; and

Whereas the success of such a movement and the deepening of the river and harbor at Savannah in the manner contemplated would naturally result in greatly increasing the commerce of that port and in benefiting largely, not only the people of Savannah, but also the people generally of the entire southeastern section of our country: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives of the State of Georgia (the senate concurring), That the movement to secure said appropriation for the purpose of deepening the river and harbor at Savannah, Ga., from 26 to 28 feet at mean high tide, be, and the same is hereby, most earnestly indorsed and approved, and the Senators and Congressmen from this State are respectfully requested to lend their active assistance to this worthy undertaking.

Passed house December 8, 1900.

JNO. T. BOIFEUILLET,
Clerk of House of Representatives.

Passed senate December 12, 1900.

CHAS. S. NORTHEN,
Secretary of Senate.

Approved, December 15, 1900.

Mr. CLAY presented a petition of sundry citizens of Bibb County, Ga., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for an increase in the salaries of the Federal judges; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the mayor and aldermen of Savannah, Ga., praying that an appropriation be made providing for the South Carolina and West Indian Exposition; which was referred to the Select Committee on Industrial Expositions.

MINTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. ALLISON. I present sundry letters from the Secretary of the Treasury, relative to the deficiencies in the appropriations for the mints at San Francisco, Philadelphia, New Orleans, and Carson City, and also in the accounts of the branch mints operated prior to April 1, 1861, at Charlotte, N. C., and Dahlonega, Ga. I move that the letters be printed as a document and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITION OF FILIPINOS.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, there has been handed to me a petition signed by 2,000 inhabitants of the Philippine Islands. I have examined the petition, and I think I can say it bears the evidence of being a bona fide, properly signed petition. It is couched in respectful language to the Congress of the United States. It involves a question of immense interest not only to the people who signed it, but to the people of the United States. It is a representative document, I think, of the people of Manila and that immediate region.

These people are not in hostility to the United States. They can not be called insurgents or bandits or rebels. They have submitted to the jurisdiction of the Government of the United States. They enter their dissent from the condition existing in those islands, and, as I said, in a respectful way and in a way that I believe will give the people of the United States a better opinion of the character of the people of those islands than they have hitherto had.

It is not a very long document. I know what I am going to ask is an unusual request, and yet, Mr. President, I think it is one that we may properly grant, and that is the privilege of having the whole petition read to the Senate. I have heard it carefully read, as have two or three other Senators, and I think they will all agree with me that there is nothing offensive in it, and I believe it would be a wise thing to read it.

Therefore I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that the body of the petition may be read. Of course I do not expect that the names will be read, although I have had them copied, and I have them here so that anyone can see the names not in script.

Mr. SPOONER. Why do you have to ask unanimous consent?

Mr. TELLER. The Senator asks me why I have to ask unanimous consent. Under the rule I do not understand that we have a right to have a petition read.

Mr. ALLISON. The substance is to be stated.

Mr. TELLER. The substance is to be stated. But, Mr. President, I am not capable, nor is any other man, of making a synopsis of the petition that will do justice to those people.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado asks unanimous consent that the petition presented to the Senate by him may be read. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Secretary will read the petition.

Mr. TELLER. I ask that the Clerk will read the petition with some care, and I ask the careful attention of the Senate to the reading.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask, for information, is debate on this matter allowable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. TELLER. Before the Clerk commences, I wish to state, as is suggested to me by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], that the petition is signed by the leading people of that section of the country—lawyers and bankers and professional men generally—and it is not a picked-up thing where somebody has secured a lot of uninterested signers. It, I believe, represents the sentiment of the best element of that community. Now let the Clerk read it.

Mr. BURROWS. May I ask the Senator how many signatures are attached to it?

Mr. TELLER. There are 2,006 signatures by actual count. As I said before, I believe they are true signatures, each man signing for himself.

Mr. HALE. This is the original petition?

Mr. TELLER. It is the original petition which I have sent to the desk. I have a copy of the names here in order that they might be a little more legible.

Mr. HALE. But the original signatures are attached?

Mr. TELLER. They are attached to the petition.

Mr. HALE. They are a part of the petition?

Mr. TELLER. They are a part of the petition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the petition.

The Secretary proceeded to read the petition, and read as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

The undersigned, Filipinos and peaceful inhabitants of this city, in their own name and in the name of the misnamed "irreconcilables," respectfully present themselves and submit to the worthy consideration of the Congress of the United States of America the following

APPEAL.

The people of the Philippine Islands, in view of their calamitous condition, demand in the name of her sons, in the name of all races, in the name of humanity, that an end be put to the misfortunes which afflict them which, while they distress and agonize her, compel her to struggle for the rights that are hers, and for the maintenance whereof she must, if necessary, continue to pour out her blood as she has so constantly and generously done on battlefields, in the woods, on the mountains in the city, everywhere! The blood which has been shed and that is still being shed, and which will continue to be shed until she has secured her rights, is not shed because of the intrigues of a few who, according to misinformed persons, desire to exploit the people and enrich themselves at the cost of their brother's blood. It has, gentlemen, sprung from the hearts of the people, who alone are the real strength of nations, the sovereign king of races, the producers of the arts, of science, of commerce, of wealth, of agriculture, of civilization, of progress, and of all the productions of human labor and intelligence, in all of which the people of the Philippine Islands had made great progress.

The Filipinos were not sunk in lethargy, as some untruthfully assert. They suffered, but the hour to break their chains came to them in August, 1896, and they proclaimed to the world their emancipation.

The revolution which broke out in August, 1896, was the work of the whole people, prepared with solemn oaths signed in the blood of the conjurors, drawn from each man's left arm, to be free or die. And amid cries of "Fatherland!" they hailed the "Supreme and Sacred Association of the Sons of the Country" (Kataastaasavag't Kagalangalang na Katipunan ng mga Anak ng Bayan). That work was eminently great; it was a present example for all time, and a fitting apopee for poet and historian, though it has as yet failed to achieve the result due to it; its grandeur and abnegation, though insulated from the rest of the civilized world, have instilled an unconquerable will into the once despondent people and an energetic life to sustain the rights of the new nation. The sons of the Philippines, some of the people barefooted, almost naked, without money, without a morsel of rice to appease their hunger, without other arms than their fists or at most a rusty knife, resolute as martyrs, launched themselves on the batteries of their enemies and, with banners flying, rushed literally into the mouth of cannon vomiting red destruction upon their ranks. They cried: "Assassinate us, drink our blood and eat our flesh, but we will be free!"

Hunger, cold, the sun's heat, mud, rain, and all the privations and sufferings of a merciless war, an almost certain death in campaigns undertaken without weapons, served but to stimulate their heroic hearts. The tears of mothers, wives, and children served only to spread throughout the people of the archipelago the unanimous cry, "Independence or death!"

It has been untruly said, but perhaps only ignorantly on the part of some, that when the revolution of 1896 broke out the country was not asking for independence. Those who say this, if they are honest in so saying, are simply without knowledge of the great association of the Katipunan and are ignorant of its noble principles and high aims.

The Katipunan is the worthy and legitimate creation of the unfortunate Andres Bonifacio. It was founded in his house, Sagunto street, Tondo, between 6 and 7 o'clock in the evening of the 7th day of July, 1892. Andres Bonifacio assembled his best friends, Teodoro Plata, Valenyin Diaz, Ladislao Diwa, Deodato Arellano, and Ildefonso Laurel, and proposed to them the creation of a supreme association of the sons of the country, whose only object was to be the independence of the country under the protectorate of Spain, or of Japan in the event of the failure of the former. The idea met with approval and enthusiasm, and immediately the propaganda thereof was commenced.

The people who felt their hearts throb with the resolve to be free joyfully allied themselves to the Katipunan, and thus in all the suburbs of the capital, in all the provinces, in all the towns and villages of the archipelago, hundreds were initiated daily, so that in four years it had 40,000 members, all of whom, absolutely all, belonged to the genuine Philippine populace, from its founders to the last member who joined before the insurrection. Bonifacio was a warehouse clerk in a firm; Plata, Diwa, and Diaz were humble officials in the law offices; Arellano was a clerk in one of the offices of the State, and Laurel was a retail merchant.

Toward the middle of 1894 they went on an exploring expedition in the mountains of San Mateo and Montalban. The party was composed of Andres Bonifacio, Aurello Tolentino, Emilio Jacinto, Francisco del Castillo, Faustino Manalak, Valeriano Dalida, Pedro Zabala, Restituto Javier, and Nicomedes Carrein. They visited the caves of Makarok and Pamitinan. In the latter they initiated the leader of all the "remontadoe" in San Mateo Mountains and in the province of Morong. They advanced to the inner part of the cave, and there inside, where the air is rare, where the flames of their bamboo torches gave no more light than a live coal in the darkness, where the smoke was suffocating, there was frantically given the first cry for the Filipine emancipation. Had the moisture and time respected the hardships of those explorers, the words "Viva la independencia Filipina," with the date, written with charcoal in the handwriting of Señor Tolentino, would to this time exist on the dark walls of the cave. Ah, it seems as if it were only yesterday!

Who now will dare to affirm that independence was not contemplated when the revolution broke out?

Aguinaldo, the most prominent figure in the revolution, is the idol of the people, the constant object of their blessings and affectionate regards because he understands the aspirations of the country; he strives unceasingly for her independence, he represents her highest ideals. Nevertheless, if this great man were to go out of the path the people have traced for him, if he should ever show weakness in the arduous labors he has undertaken, if his energies should ever fail him in the present difficulties, he would undoubtedly lose the nation's love, and the blessings now showered upon him would be transferred to whomsoever would realize better the nation's aspirations and further the work which Rizal and his worthy companions have begun.

In mentioning all these facts we want it to be understood that nothing but the noble desire of bringing the truth to the illustrious Congress has moved us. We want to lay before her these antecedents that she may bear them in mind and consider whether they deserve to be placed among the many data which she is collecting. It is not merely for the sake of the alleged facts published in annexation papers, but to tell the truth about the principles, means, and ends of the revolution; we want as parties directly interested in the question, to contribute to the work of solving the serious difficulty which weighs upon the country; we want not only a greater moral and material guarantee for America, but a stable, permanent, worthy, and honorable peace for the Philippines, our beloved country. We want, finally, to strengthen the bonds of friendship with those with whom we have shed our blood during the Spanish-American war, and who helped us to throw off the sovereignty of a mother, affectionate indeed, but weak and ruled by mercenary hands which oppressed us in a scandalous manner.

Well, since facts are required for the solution of the present problem, we will give some of those which are in our possession.

1. On the night of February 4, 1899, hostilities began between the Filipinos and Americans. Those who knew nothing of our people thought that with the capture of the general headquarters at Polo the Filipinos would lay down their arms. The place was taken, but no arms were surrendered.

Then it was said, if Malolos, the birthplace of the newly born Philippine Republic, was captured the Filipinos would realize the weakness of their army and would soon surrender. Malolos was captured, but there was no thought of surrender.

Then it was affirmed that the Filipinos did not surrender because they thought that the Americans would perish in the Rio Grande of Pampanga Province. The river was crossed, but they waited in vain for the surrender.

It was believed that if San Isidro should happen to fall into the hands of the Americans the Filipinos would see that the revolution was being pursued, not only on the railway line but also on other sides, and that this would compel them to surrender. San Isidro was taken, and what happened? Nothing!

It was contended that the capture of the northern provinces of Luzon would cause the revolutionists to despair. The said provinces were captured and the revolutionists, instead of surrendering, prepared themselves for an indefinite war. The Republic was suspended; the army was divided into guerrilla bands; Aguinaldo, whose whereabouts nobody knows, seems to command and direct everybody on the mountains and towns of all the Philippine regions.

2. In May, 1899, Señor Tolentino, who was commissioned by the junta of prominent Filipinos of this city and by the American Civil Commission, under the presidency of Mr. Schurman, to establish a means for a mutual understanding between the American Government and the Filipino government went to San Isidro, Nueva Ecija, with the consent of General Otis and th verbal instruction of the latter and of the said commission. He obtained several formal interviews with Señor Aguinaldo, Señor Mabini, and other prominent men of the revolution, and spoke to them according to the instructions he had received. He stated that the Americans did not come to the Philippines to wage war on us, but to protect us, further our welfare, and defend our interests against unexpected and serious things which might befall the country; but in order to accomplish this, the surrender of the arms of the Philippine army was first necessary, without which the American arms would be compelled to annihilate everything relating to the Philippine republic. To this everyone, without exception, replied that they preferred death to surrendering their arms, because, they said, they were striving for the independence of the country. Señor Aguinaldo, on his part, replied that he did not want to have war with anybody, and still less with the Americans, but that he did want and would always want the Philippine nation to be recognized as such, even at the cost of drenching the land with its people's blood. He further said that in view of the inferiority of his weapons, as compared with those of the Americans, it might happen that some day he would lose the hope of victory, but he would never lose the hope of dying for the independence of his country.

3. Since the revolution began until now the peaceful people who are engaged in their ordinary vocations have liberally supported in private the national soldiers, and they seem to be disposed to support them all the time so long as the war lasts.

4. It has been said that the continuous vicissitudes of a poor and toilsome campaign as that of the Philippine nationalists would in itself kill the revolution, compelling the former to find the living of their family in the labors which peaceful people always offer to those who desire them. Without considering that the revolutionists are inured to these vicissitudes, we would say that perhaps they are right; but if 2 get tired there would be 4 who would take their places in the battlefield; and if 100 retire, 1,000 would take their places, as it happened during the insurrection against the Spaniards and still happens now all over the archipelago. On the other side, it is evident that misery, death, desolation in the towns, and all the horrors with which every war is attended only dissuade the self-sufficient and the rich, whilst we notice a contrary effect on the people, arousing in them spite, revenge, in some perhaps despair, which darkens the future toward which they look with eagerness and hope.

5. It has also been said that there would be a day when the revolution would not have even a grain of powder, and this would be a sufficient cause for it to die by itself. We dispute this, not for the reason that it would be possible to smuggle arms in a place which might not be watched, but because the facts show that with "bolos" the nationalist soldiers have provided and still provide themselves not only with ammunition, but also with arms, from the enemy itself. That it is also necessary to destroy the bolos. Yes; it is necessary, but it seems, nevertheless, to be an impossible necessity, because if with 10 bolos they can get 1 rifle, with 10 bolos and 1 rifle they could get 3 rifles; that makes already 10 bolos and 4 rifles, with which they could lay an ambush, and thus, alas, peace would only be an illusion.

6. It has been said that no political aspiration is at the bottom of the revolution, but that it is only a pretext employed by the generals, leaders, and officers in order to enrich themselves by means of theft. This is disproved by the fact that, though violations and robberies are common in all the revolutions of the world, in the Philippine revolution the very few Filipinos who committed d ls of this kind have all been summarily dealt with and given exemplary punishment as a warning to the rest. Moreover, in order to belie calumnies so unjust, it must be borne in mind that there are many, a great many, people who before taking to the battlefield had very large fortunes, but who afterwards came back without home, without clothing, and without a penny with which to feed their children. It is consequently unquestionable that the revolution is pursuing a highly political ideal. Let its aspirations be satisfied, and we shall see if there will be a single insurgent in those forests which recall such sad recollections to our afflicted minds.

7. The hostile attitude of the nationalist soldiers reveals itself in a conclusive way, in that they are ready to support the arms of the revolution, even at the cost of long and mortal sacrifice to be offered at the altar of the Philippine independence. The people, on their part, share this attitude morally and materially by lamenting their defeats, by celebrating their victories, and by giving their support in every possible way, in attending the wounded, when the least possible military advantage has been gained, and in defending the new positions occupied.

8. All the islands of the archipelago are supporting the arms of the revolution while they are waiting for the attitude which Luzon shall take, as they consider that on the decision of the latter hangs the ultimate destiny of the Filipino people.

9. The Filipino government and congress, provisionally suspended, are the synthesis of all that the country thinks. Even the Moros of Mindanao, Sulu, and other islands desire and demand the independence of the country, convinced that this alone could satisfy the necessities and aspirations of the people they represent. This is unquestionable, inasmuch as the constitution of the Philippine republic has been celebrated with the greatest enthusiasm in all the forests, mountains, barrios, towns, and cities of the archipelago.

For these reasons and for thousands of others, which would be too long to relate, we think it to be urgent to seek the remedies which our beloved country demands in the name of humanity, and so relieve her from the terrible situation into which she has been led by long and bloody misfortunes. We have not hesitated, therefore, to present this appeal to the United States Congress, trusting that the latter may better understand the real aims and aspirations of our people. Therefore the Philippine Nation, bearing in mind not only the heroic history of America, but also her sacred traditions, her humanitarian doctrines, and her democratic institutions, asks of America to cease her persecution of men struggling to be free against greater odds and greater wrongs than those which inspired the fathers of the American Republic. We ask this of Americans in the name of Washington, in the name of Jefferson, in the name of Lincoln, in the name of justice, and in the name of God Eternal, Judge of the world.

We have said that the Filipinos desire a solution that would satisfy their aspirations, but which would at the same time guarantee, morally and materially, the sacrifices which have been made by America. Let us see what this solution is.

The annexation of the Philippines to America as one of her States can in no way be admissible in the present difficulties. First, because the Filipinos see in the difference of races great impediments to political unity. Secondly, because we are 7,000 miles away from her shores. Thirdly, because the people think that they should live by themselves.

The difference of race brings with it the difference of its traditions, language, manners, policy, necessities, aspirations, and ways of thinking. This difference is causing and will cause disagreement in everything that concerns the life of both races. It will cause deceit in their relations, since between the two there is no real sincerity possible. It will cause a constant difference, if not direct opposition, in their opinions regarding the past, the present, and the future. It will cause continuous and permanent discord in Filipino-American societies. And, worst of all, it will cause a a tenacious and unavoidable distrust of the people in the administration of a mother who imposes herself by means of force.

The great distance which separates the Philippines from America will render direct communication between the two difficult and the burden of the political and military expenditure of the Philippine State heavier, to the disadvantage of the country and the indefinite condemnation of the people who do not make the laws which they are called on to obey. All these things together are causing and will always cause the perversion of the truth regarding public matters in order to favor private conveniences. Man is weak. It will mean ruin to all the productions of the country, for the exports must cease when the price of our products is raised beyond their real value, which will necessarily be the case, because the pay of workmen and officials will have to be raised and the commercial and industrial taxes increased to meet the Filipino political and military expenditures, occasioned by the expense of paying soldiers from across the ocean. What is more lamentable still, is that only those who have money would be able to go to America to learn the American laws and language, and thus the people would remain deaf and mute, and "between the sword and the wall," ready to step forward when they are told to step back and to step back when they are told to step forward.

The ideal which the country has conceived to lead an independent life will compel her, even at the cost of cruel sacrifices, to threaten, to provoke, and attack in all occasions any hindrance to her aspirations. She sees in these aspirations a sacred purpose, and this makes her constant in what she pursues, because she shall never forget the generous blood which has been shed by her illustrious sons, from Burgos, Zamora, and Gomez, to those who are still struggling on the battlefields. There have been occasions when seeing so much bloodshed, so many corpses, so much horror, and unable to refrain herself, she has given utterance to the desperate cry: "Let us all die there where our brothers died."

We have seen, therefore, in an unquestionable way that the annexation of the Philippines to America as a state would not be acceptable to the Philippine people.

An ample autonomy similar to that of Canada or Australia would not be acceptable either, since it is not in accordance with the aspirations of the people as it has already been proven.

The people established the "katipunan" in order to proclaim their independence. They were prodigal in all kinds of sacrifices, they knew that their undertaking would cost them dear, but they persevered and are persevering in their ideal, and, what is more striking, the long train of bitter misfortunes neither brings them matter for reproach nor clouds the sky of their cherished hopes.

Even supposing that America should force us to submit, and after many years of war the country should submit, as the lesser evil, to the proclamation of an ample autonomy, that autonomy would not produce a sincere bond of friendship between the two people, because, having sacrificed herself for her independence, the country could not look with affection upon those who would be the only obstacle to her happiness. She would always retain her aspirations, so that autonomy would be a short "interregnum," which the country would necessarily take advantage of to regain new strength to be used in the attainment of her high political ideals, happen what may, and perhaps in some hour of peril strike a fatal blow at a hated oppressor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on the Philippines.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I wish to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that the petition may be printed as a document.

Mr. HAWLEY. I object. It is a treasonable denunciation of the Government and an attack upon all our soldiers.

Mr. HOAR. Is there to be debate? I thought the Senator was delighted that we were to be dumb; but if he is going to speak——

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No debate is in order. The Senator from Colorado asks unanimous consent that the petition be printed as a document. Is there objection?

Mr. HAWLEY. I do object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made. It will be referred to the Committee on the Philippines.

Mr. BACON. I am informed that the reading was not completed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair supposed that it had been completed.

Mr. TELLER. I supposed it had been concluded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the petition.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the petition, as follows:

No! Autonomy would not bring the desired peace. There might be a relative tranquillity, but this would be simulated and temporary. The greater the tranquillity the more reason there would be for fear; like a volcano, which smothers in its breast numberless destructive elements, concealing by the appearance of its crater the incessant rage of its infernal bosom, so that when it lets loose its passions the shock is more powerful, everything that it contains being belched forth far and wide as if to lay waste whatever it meets in its terrible passage.

In giving this warning we do not forget the good Americans whom we sincerely respect; we are mindful of the rupture of our good relations with the United States; we are mindful of the blood which will again run on the soil of our country. We see in that autonomy a new and sorrowful page in the history of the Philippines, and therefore we can not but look upon it with horror. Our people have had enough of suffering.

It has already been demonstrated that autonomy could not bring anything but serious grievances to America and the Philippines alike. Let us see if independence could produce mutual benefits for both countries.

We have already shown that independence has been our motto, and, in order to secure this independence, the people swore to sacrifice their whole existence, if necessary. They have appealed to humanity, asking to have recognized what by rights belongs to them. They steadfastly believe that their independence is their only salvation. Should they obtain it, they would be forever grateful to whomsoever shall have helped them in their undertaking; they would consider him as their redeemer, and his name will be engraved with bright letters in the national history, that all the generations to come may read it with sublime veneration.

America, consistent with her tradition, is the only one which could play that great rôle in the present and future of the Philippines. If she recognizes their independence, they could offer her a part of the revenues of the Philippine state, according to the treaty which shall be stipulated; the protection in the country of the merchandise of the United States, and a moral and material guarantee for American capital all over the archipelago; finally, whatever may bring greater prosperity to America and progress to the country will, we doubt not, be taken into account in the treaty which shall be celebrated.

That the independence of the country will be attended with anarchy is asserted only by those who, offending the truth and forgetting their dignity, represent the Filipinos under horrible colors, comparing them to beasts. Their assertions are backed by isolated acts of pillage and robbery. What revolution of the world was free from such deeds? At this epoch passions are unrestrained; vengeance finds opportunity to satisfy itself; private ambitions are often favored by the occasion. Could such criminal deeds be avoided? Pythagoras said: "If you like to see monsters, travel through a country during a revolution."

Are the Filipinos not fit to govern themselves? It has been sufficiently proven that they are since the constitution of the Philippine republic down to this time, in which the government is compelled to seek refuge in the mountains It has always recommended itself on the Filipino character; it has always been respected by the people with reverence, and it has always been the protector of life and property and of all that which has come under its jurisdiction.

The constitution of the Philippine republic has proven in a conclusive way that the Filipinos are fitted for an independent government of the archipelago. It is true that on certain occasions there have been a few slight interruptions to the normal progress of the government. But these were unavoidable, since the attention of its prominent men not only could not exclusively be turned to their civil duties, being engaged by the American military operations; for with war, incendiarism, and the continual movement of entire towns and provinces the wisest government in the world could not make regular progress. Furthermore, the future of the country was uncertain, and this caused, in spite of the good and united will of the rulers and the government, further irregularities.

On the other hand, it must be remembered that there were and are Filipinos eminent in politics, military affairs, letters, fine arts, law, medicine, commerce, agriculture, and all that relates to the moral and material culture of man. The most ignorant Filipino reveals a refined quality in his civil life, an unusual submission to authority, a sublime patriotism which is not noticeable in everyone; and what is more remarkable is the fact that in spite of the religious corporations having declared war against Philippine instruction, there are only 20 per cent of the people who can not write and read, and their eagerness for education and improvement is incomparable.

This is no doubt the reason that made honest Americans to realize that the Filipinos are more capable of self-government than the Cubans.

In order to end our appeal we will say, with the learned lawyer, Señor Mabini: "To govern is to study the wants and interpret the aspirations of the people, in order to remedy the former and satisfy the latter." If the natives who know the wants, customs, and aspirations of the people are not fit to govern them, would the Americans, who have had but little to do with the Filipinos, be more capable to govern the latter?

We have, therefore, already proven—

1. That the revolution was the exclusive work of the public;
2. That in preparing it they were moved by a great ideal, the ideal of independence;
3. That they are ready to sacrifice their whole existence in order to realize their just aspirations;
4. That in spite of the serious difficulties through which they are passing, they still expect from America that she will consider them with impartiality and justice, and will recognize what by right belongs to them, and thus give them an opportunity to show their boundless gratitude;
5. That the annexation of the Philippines to America is not feasible;
6. That the American sovereignty is not favored by the Philippine people;
7. That an ample autonomy can not be imposed without violating the Filipino will;
8. That the Filipinos are firm for self-government.

From this it results that the only admissible solution for the present difficulties is the recognition by America of the independence of the Filipinos. In saying this we do not consider either the nullity or the legality of the Paris treaty on our country, but the well-known doctrine of the immortal Washington, and of the sons of the United States of America, worthy champions of oppressed people.

Therefore we, in the name of justice and with all the energies of our souls, demand—

1. That the independence of the Filipinos be recognized;
2. That all the necessary information regarding the events which are taking place, concerning the peaceful towns and places which are supporting the arms of the revolution, be obtained from Filipinos who, by their antecedents and by their actual conduct, deserve the respect and confidence of the Filipino people.

MANILA, July 15, 1900.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on the Philippines.

Mr. TELLER. I want to renew the request I made that it be printed as a document.

Mr. HAWLEY. And I shall renew the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Petitions and memorials are still in order.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. I want to make an inquiry of the Chair. This petition has been read. Will the names which follow appear in the RECORD?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will not.

Mr. TELLER. Then I will ask permission to have them put in.

Mr. HAWLEY. I object. I object to putting treason in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made. The Chair will state that there was an order passed at a former session of the Senate directing that no names should be printed wherever the body of a petition was authorized to be printed.

Mr. TELLER. Do I understand that to be the rule of the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes.

Mr. VEST. I want to make a parliamentary inquiry. Can not the Senator from Colorado or any other Senator move to have this paper printed as a public document with the names?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is inclined to the opinion that such a motion might not be in order just now, but there are times when such a motion would be in order. Under the rule, however, if the motion were made, the Chair would be obliged to send it to the Committee on Printing, unless the Senate should otherwise determine. The regular order now is the reception of morning business.

Mr. TELLER. I did not make the motion to have the entire petition printed because I thought it ought not to be made in the morning hour, but I intend to make it later.

Mr. HOAR (to Mr. TELLER). Put it in the form of an ordinary resolution, and then it will come up properly in the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no further petitions or memorials, reports of committees are now in order.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5404) to extend the privileges provided by an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to the immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880, as amended, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BERRY, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5365) to extend the privileges provided by an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to the immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880, as amended, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MARTIN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5350) for the establishment of a subport of entry at Douglas, Ariz., reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HANNA, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5331) to provide an American register for the barkentine J. C. Pfluger, of San Francisco, Cal., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5364) to establish a light and fog station at Point Dume, Los Angeles County, Cal., reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. THURSTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3852) providing for an additional district judge in the districts of Minnesota and Nebraska, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

STEAM REVENUE CUTTER FOR BOSTON HARBOR.

Mr. MASON. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5337) providing for the construction of a steam revenue cutter for service in the harbor of Boston, Mass., to report it favorably without amendment.

Mr. LODGE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which has just been reported. It will be read to the Senate in full for its information.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized to purchase or build a suitable vessel to be used as a revenue cutter of the third class at the port of Boston, Mass.: Provided, That the cost of said vessel shall not exceed the sum of $50,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Let the report be read.

Mr. MASON. I will say to the Senator that the substance of the report is the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to have it read.

Mr. LODGE. Let the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury be read, which is the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5337, providing for the construction of a steam revenue cutter for service in the harbor of Boston, Mass., having considered the same, report with recommendation that the bill pass. The reasons for this conclusion will appear in the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, to whom the bill was referred, which is appended and made a part of this report:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, January 5, 1901.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 4th instant, inclosing bill S. 5337, Fifty-sixth Congress, second session, providing for the construction of a steam revenue cutter for service in the harbor at Boston, Mass., and requesting me to furnish your committee with such suggestions as I may deem proper touching the merits of the bill and the propriety of its passage.

The revenue cutter Chandler, now employed on harbor service at Boston, Mass., has been worn out in service. It has been actively on duty for the past thirty-five years. It did duty in the civil war, and was transferred to the Revenue-Cutter Service in 1865, at an original cost of $6,500, and it has cost nearly $35,000 to keep this vessel in order since. It is a wooden vessel, a very small tug, very slow, and not at all adapted to the work.

Believing that this vessel should be replaced by a suitable one as soon as practicable, I recommend the passage of the bill herewith returned.

Respectfully,

L. J. GAGE, Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM P. FRYE,
Chairman Committee on Commerce, United States Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REGULAR OFFICERS AS OFFICERS OF VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. HAWLEY. I report favorably from the Committee on Military Affairs a resolution calling for certain statements relating to the Army.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. PETTIGREW January 8, 1901, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate with the names of all officers of the Regular Army who were appointed to be officers of volunteers since May 1, 1898, the rank said officers held in the Regular Army when so appointed, the rank to which appointed in the volunteers, and the rank now held in the volunteers; whether any regular officers so appointed to volunteer regiments have been assigned to duty other than that of duty in the field with their regiments, the names of officers so detailed, with the date of the detail, the special duty to which assigned, and where such special duty has been and is now being performed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think if that information is to be obtained, the quicker we obtain it the better. So I ask for immediate action on the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I report favorably from the Committee on Printing a concurrent resolution submitted by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] for the printing of hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs, for which I ask immediate consideration.

The concurrent resolution submitted by Mr. BUTLER January 8, 1901, was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed as a Senate document 15,000 copies of the hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate and the House on Army bill (S. 4300), of which 5,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 10,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MCENERY introduced a bill (S. 5513) for the relief of Rosemond Le Blanc; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 5514) granting a pension to William Y. Turner; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HALE introduced a bill (S. 5515) granting an increase of pension to John Williams; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. RAWLINS introduced a bill (S. 5520) to establish a fish-hatching and fish station in the State of Utah; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Fisheries.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5521) for the establishment of an assay office at Provo City, Utah; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. CARTER introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 5522) granting a pension to John J. Zimmerman; and

A bill (S. 5523) granting a pension to Elizabeth K. Freeman.

Mr. CARTER introduced a bill (S. 5524) for the relief of Dr. Charles B. Miller; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a bill (S. 5525) granting an increase of pension to Warren Damon; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SHOUP (by request) introduced a bill (S. 5526) for the relief of Maj. James Rockwell, jr.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 5527) for the relief of Marion McKibben; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 5528) for the relief of Thomas M. Steep; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. DANIEL (by request) introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (S. 5529) for the relief of John J. Mitchell.

A bill (S. 5530) for the relief of Lucy B. Legrande, Catharine Jameson, Elizabeth H. Lester, Shirley B. Shackelford, Edwin A. Gibson, and the heirs of Henry Shackelford, deceased; and

A bill (S. 5531) for the relief of Richard K. Hughlett.

Mr. PERKINS introduced a bill (S. 5532) to amend section 3 of an act entitled "An act to determine the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States, and to regulate the removal of causes from State courts, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1875, as amended by an act approved March 3, 1887; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. TURLEY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 12394) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures, and for other purposes," approved June 13, 1898, and to reduce taxation thereunder; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOAR submitted an amendment increasing the salaries of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States and of the circuit and district courts of the United States, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MONEY submitted an amendment providing for the establishment in the Department of the Interior of a psychophysical laboratory, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUTLER submitted an amendment authorizing the Secretary of War to appoint a board of engineers to make an additional survey of an inland water route from Norfolk, Va., to Beaufort Inlet, N. C., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PETTIGREW submitted an amendment proposing to confer full jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render judgment upon the claim of the Sisseton and Wahpeton bands of Dakota or Sioux Indians for the annuities provided by the treaty with said bands on July 23, 1851, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $125,000 to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to acquire by purchase from the owners, Analostan Island, in the Potomac River, near the city of Washington, intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

CHEROKEE ENROLLMENT.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, I desire to present to the Senate, and by that means to the public, two letters which I have in my possession, which I think the ends of justice require shall be made public. They are very short, and I will read them. The first letter is dated Maysville, Ark., December 10, 1900. It is addressed to me, and is in the following language:

Will you please inform me if there is an agreement made with the Committee on Indian Affairs with Mr. M. M. Edmiston, of Vinita, Ind. T., to allow 125 families to be enrolled as Cherokees? I am a claimant myself and have paid Mr. Edmiston a good deal of money to attend to it and get it all righted up for me. Now, I understand that there is no contract to that effect, and if it is not so, Mr. E. has obtained money under false pretense, as he has informed us that he had a contract to that effect with you.

Please give me all the information you can concerning the claimants' right in the Territory. Please let me hear from you as early as possible and oblige, etc.

Some other gentleman in the Indian Territory has sent me a copy of a letter written by this man Edmiston to one of those people. It is proper for me to explain to the Senate that there are thousands of people in the Indian Territory who are claiming the right to be enrolled as Cherokees, and there are some men claiming to be attorneys who are pretending that they can by some means, by some sort of influence which they can bring to bear, have those people enrolled as Cherokees. This means is adopted for the purpose of robbing hundreds of poor people of their hard-earned money, when the men who are getting the money know perfectly well that they can render them no service whatever, and they do not expect to render them any service. It is simply a means of obtaining money by fraudulent pretenses. Here is the letter of Mr. Edmiston, referred to in the letter which I have just now read:

VINITA, IND. T., August 3, 1900.

DEAR SIR: Pressing business, after five months' absence in Washington, has caused delay in writing claimants as to present conditions. The fight was persistent before the committees. Our efforts from the first were to have an investigation of the works of the Dawes Commission. We won our contention by securing the removal of Mr. McKennon, who presented matters for legislation in favor of the Indians, as a paid attorney would be expected to do. His removal was a victory, as much interest exhibited by our opponents was lost when Mr. McKennon stepped down.

We were promised by the Senate committee that our amendment would go on the treaty. The subcommittee of the House, acting independently, introduced the treaty bill without our amendment. When Senator JONES asked for consent to introduce the same bill in the Senate, Senator STEWART, whom we had won to our side, objected on the proposition of right, that our amendment should go on the treaty. This prevented the bill then introduced in the Senate from passing. Later Senator JONES agreed that a modified amendment made or suggested by himself should go on the bill. The amendment is as follows:

"That claimants having Masters reports showing Indian blood, not to exceed 125 families, to be named, shall be enrolled by the Secretary on proof of residence on April 1, 1900."

This was agreed to by members of the House committee who had opposed our claim. The following day Senator JONES arose to introduce the treaty with our amendment, when Senator MCLAURIN had the bill go over to December, that the lease provision might be discussed. It is understood that the lease clause will be compromised and the treaty with our amendment will pass early in the next session.

The Indians can not afford to accept the Curtis bill, and they will ratify the treaty with our amendment, which will admit about 500 or 600 people.

Of course, the amendment cuts out those who have moved out of the Territory with intent to remain away. We could not take chances in the loss to those who have remained.

It is important that I return to Washington to see that no slip is made and that the promises made us will be fulfilled.

A very few claimants advanced the extra money to keep me in the capital so long, some of them paying more than $75. There is to be a cash expenditure of probably $500 to insure enrollment, besides my expenses. The claimants now in the Territory to the stated number have every assurance of enrollment. The men who have advanced the money suggest that a list of 105 families be made on the conditions that $10 be paid me by each family, which amount will be deducted from the contract fee of 15 per cent.

My clients will not number more than 105 families. I wish to place them first on the list. As there may be families represented by other attorneys who may apply to me, it is important that my clients who desire to join this list do so at once. I will name the families in the order I receive them to the number of 105. If there are others, they will be left out under the amendment. I desire the names and ages of each member of your family who is a claimant. This letter is intended for all claimants.

I gave up my office for five months, and I will succeed, as I have always stated; but success will only come to those who do their part, which is small compared to my loss of time. You are at home conducting your business. A few dollars is nothing to you compared to my loss of time from family and business. Trusting you will see the importance of acting early,

I am, very truly,

W. M. EDMISTON.

Mr. President, the statements of alleged fact in this letter of this man, intending to induce hundreds of applicants for enrollment to send him money, are absolutely false in every single respect so far as they relate to the Indian Committee or to any member of it, so far as I know and believe.

All the claim on his part that he had Mr. McKennon removed from the Dawes Commission is the veriest nonsense. Mr. McKennon saw the Secretary of the Interior and told him that on account of private arrangements he wanted to resign. It was a matter strictly confidential between Mr. McKennon and the Secretary. Neither my colleague [Mr. BERRY] nor I, who have known Mr. McKennon almost from boyhood, knew that he had any idea of resigning. We were told of it only at the time the Secretary was ready to fill Mr. McKennon's place. He resigned because he wanted to go into other business; and yet this man Edmiston unblushingly publishes in a letter—it was not published in the newspapers, but sent broadcast throughout the country—that he had Mr. McKennon removed. He had nothing on the face of the earth to do with it. Mr. McKennon's resignation was voluntary. There has never been a charge made against his good name, so far as I know or have ever heard, except in this letter.

The claim of this man Edmiston that he is attorney for 105 families and that he has some private arrangements with the Committee on Indian Affairs by which he can have these people enrolled is nothing but nonsense.

Mr. TELLER. What is the name?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. M. M. Edmiston. He lives at Vinita, Ind. T.

He comes here occasionally, and wanted to come before the committee, claiming to represent somebody. The whole purpose of all this business is to induce a lot of people there to believe that he has some influence here, and that by paying him ten, or fifteen, or twenty dollars, or fifty dollars, he will be able to do them some good, when everybody in the Senate and everybody who knows anything about the proceedings here knows there is not the slightest possibility of his doing so. I simply present these matters so that they may be made public and so that they can go to every one of these poor people who have been hoodwinked and deluded and robbed by these scoundrels, so that they may know what the facts are.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to say only a word. So far as my knowledge extends, every material part of that letter is false. Mr. Edmiston came before the committee and we heard him there. We were willing to correct any mistakes and to listen to what he had to say and to what others had to say in regard to the matter. No intimation of what we would do was made by me or anybody else, as I am very certain, and the whole substance of the letter is therefore absolutely false.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Arkansas request that the letters be printed as a document, or simply in the RECORD?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I care nothing about it. I read them, and I suppose they will go into the RECORD and thereby become public. I do not care anything about it.

PAYMENT OF STENOGRAPHERS.

Mr. PRITCHARD submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the stenographer employed to report the hearing before the Committee on Patents on the bill (S. 5089) for the relief of the widow of Isaiah Smith Hyatt be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. PROCTOR submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the stenographer employed to report the hearings before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry upon House bill 3717, known as the oleomargarine bill, be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. MONEY. I ask leave to withdraw the amendment of which I gave notice, intended to be submitted to the bill (S. 4300) to increase the efficiency of the military establishment of the United States, and to present in its place, in order to correct verbal errors, another amendment, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator asks that the present proposed amendment be inserted in the RECORD?

Mr. MONEY. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the former amendment will be withdrawn and the amendment now submitted by the Senator from Mississippi will be printed in the RECORD, and lie on the table.

The amendment referred to is as follows:

And provided also, That each and every provision of this act shall continue in force until July 1, 1903, and on and after that date all the general, staff, and line officers appointed to the Army under this act shall be discharged, and the numbers restored in each grade to those existing at the passage of this act, and the enlisted force of the line of the Army shall be reduced to the number as provided for by law prior to April 1, 1898, exclusive of such additions as have been or may be made under this act to the artillery, and except the cadets provided for by this act who may be appointed prior to July 1, 1903: And provided further, That no officer who has been or may be promoted under existing law or under the rules of seniority shall be disturbed in his rank.

PETITION OF FILIPINOS.

Mr. TELLER. I ask for the adoption of the order which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado presents an order, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That the petition of certain inhabitants of the Philippine Islands, which has to-day been read in the Senate, be printed as a document, together with the names of the signers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Has the Senator from Colorado ascertained the probable cost of printing this document?

Mr. LODGE. It will be much less than $500. It is a very short petition to be printed, I think. The names, I understand, have all been taken off.

Mr. TELLER. The names have all been put in type, so there will be no trouble in agreeing to the order.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I just want to enter my protest against this violently treasonable document, an attack upon the United States, upon its power, upon its troops, a passionate appeal to continue to kill our men. If Jefferson Davis brought along a similar paper after the battle of Gettysburg I do not think it would have been read and printed as a document to be circulated among the people of the United States, and it would have been a mild crime in comparison with this.

Mr. TELLER. I ask for the adoption of the order. I do not understand that the Senator from Connecticut objects.

Mr. HAWLEY. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator objects, it will go over for one day under the rule.

Mr. HAWLEY. I object.

Mr. TELLER. Then let it go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order will go over.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR GEAR.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Saturday, the 19th of January, after the routine morning business, I shall submit resolutions commemorative of the life and services of the Hon. JOHN HENRY GEAR, late a Senator from the State of Iowa.

THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Army bill.

There being no objection, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4300) to increase the efficiency of the military establishment of the United States.

Mr. HAWLEY. I believe the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] is pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont will be read.

The SECRETARY. An amendment by Mr. PROCTOR, on page 36, line 16, to strike out all of section 24 after the words "Military Academy" and insert the following:

Persons not over 40 years of age who have served as volunteers subsequent to April 21, 1898, may be ordered before boards of officers for such examination as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, and who may establish their fitness before these examining boards, may be appointed to the grades of first or second lieutenant in the Regular Army, taking rank in the respective grades according to seniority as determined by length of prior commissioned service; but no officer appointed under the provisions of this section shall be placed above another in the same grade with longer commissioned service, and nothing herein contained shall change the relative rank of officers heretofore commissioned in the Regular Army.

Enlisted men of volunteers may be appointed second lieutenants in the Regular Army under the same conditions now authorized by law for enlisted men of the Regular Army.

Mr. SPOONER. We had some discussion the other day as to the construction of this amendment. I understood the Senator from Vermont to agree that there should be inserted there the words "at any time," the point being to exclude the construction that it required a continuous service.

Mr. PROCTOR. I accept that. Let it read "shall have served."

Mr. SPOONER. I do not think that does it. I suggest that the words "shall have at any time served" will cover it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Vermont, if I am not mistaken in the signs, is willing to accept my suggestion and is writing it into the amendment.

Mr. PROCTOR. Certainly. In line 3 of the amendment I move to modify it by inserting after the word "who" the word "shall," and after the word "have" the words "at any time," so as to read "who shall have at any time served as volunteers."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator proposes to modify his amendment in that way?

Mr. PROCTOR. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be considered as modified to that extent.

Mr. DANIEL. I desire to offer a substitute for the entire amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The substitute will be read.

Mr. PROCTOR. I suggest the point whether the substitute is in order. It was understood that after the committee amendments had been adopted any amendments might be considered, and it was my impression that amendments to amendments were not to be considered at this stage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that under the unanimous-consent agreement the Senator from Vermont is correct.

Mr. PROCTOR. It will be in order after the committee amendments are considered.

Mr. SPOONER. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The substitute will be read for information.

The SECRETARY. An amendment by Mr. DANIEL to insert, in lieu of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, the following:

An officer or enlisted man of volunteers who has at any time been, or who may hereafter be, mustered into the service of the United States, and who may possess an honorable record, shall be eligible to appointment by the President, subject to confirmation by the Senate, to any office in the Regular Army of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the unanimous-consent agreement the proposed substitute can not now be considered, but it will be in order at a subsequent time. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. DANIEL. Is not this amendment in order now as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Vermont?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would suggest to the Senator from Virginia that as the present occupant of the chair understands the matter there was a unanimous-consent agreement entered into that amendments submitted by the committee should be first considered, but that afterwards it should be in order for any Senator to move to amend them, or to substitute any matter for them.

Mr. DANIEL. Of course, if this is thought to be a breach of the unanimous-consent agreement, I shall not insist upon it now. Do I understand that the Senator from Vermont looks at it in that way?

Mr. PROCTOR. I understood the agreement and purpose to be that the bill should be perfected as the committee recommended, and that then any amendments would be in order, but not before that time.

Mr. HOAR. The unanimous-consent agreement, as I understood it, went a little further than the Chair has stated it, because if committee amendments were to be first in order, of course it would be in order to amend them or to offer substitutes for them. The unanimous-consent agreement was that thereafter all amendments, even to those committee amendments or otherwise, should be in order. It was intended first to get the bill in the shape in which the committee wanted it, as if it were reported. So I understand the substitute for the committee amendment now proposed by the Senator from Virginia will be in order later under the agreement, although it would not be without the agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts is undoubtedly correct. The Chair did not think it necessary to state that fact.

Mr. DANIEL. I think every Senator here who knows me knows that I would not trench upon a unanimous-consent agreement. I have not the words of the agreement before me, but as I understood the agreement it was that gentlemen who had independent amendments to the bill to offer would not be precluded from offering them by passing by amendments now, and would be heard after the bill was perfected by considering amendments offered by the committee. I did not know or apprehend that there was any agreement that would cut off any member of the Senate from perfecting or offering a substitute for a proposition of the committee to amend the bill. I did not so understand it. If that is the understanding of the Senate, of course I have not another word to say.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Virginia is not cut off. As I understand the effect of the agreement, it is that the amendments of the committee should be considered, and that those amendments should be open to amendment as though they were a part of the original text. So it is perfectly proper under the agreement at a later stage to move to strike out this amendment.

Mr. DANIEL. Is it not proper now?

Mr. ALLISON. I understand the Chair to think not.

Mr. DANIEL. If the Chair thinks, and I submit this matter entirely to the judgment of the Chair, that it is not within the purview of the unanimous-consent agreement that this substitute shall be offered now, I shall not offer it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair regrets to say to the Senator from Virginia that it does so hold.

Mr. DANIEL. I understand.

Mr. BATE. Do I understand that no amendment can be presented as a substitute for a committee amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The opinion of the Chair is that under the unanimous-consent agreement it can not be done at the present time, but it may be at some subsequent period.

Mr. BATE. I suppose after we have passed upon the amendments which the committee have recommended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Vermont as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. An amendment proposed by Mr. HAWLEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, on page 31, line 9, after "two hundred" to insert "and fifty."

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to know how the paragraph will then read.

Mr. BATE. Do I understand that is the amendment relating to the Signal Corps, providing an addition of 50?

Mr. HAWLEY. The amendment relates to the Signal Corps, and has been approved by the committee. It adds 50 privates to the force of that corps, who are absolutely needed, in the judgment of the officers there.

Mr. BATE. I had a substitute that I proposed to offer for that, but under the ruling of the Chair it will go over. I do not object to this amendment, but I do not think it is large enough, and I shall offer an amendment calling for a larger number.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next committee amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 39 the committee proposes to strike out section 37 and insert as new section 31 the following:

SEC. 31. That any officer of the Army now on the active list below the grade of brigadier-general, who served during the civil war, shall, when retired, be retired with the rank and pay of the next higher grade, except such officers as may be retired under section 29 of this act. This section shall apply to officers who have been retired on or since the 11th day of August, 1898, but shall not apply to any officer whose service on the active list does not exceed thirty-five years.

Mr. COCKRELL. There ought to be more than that.

Mr. HAWLEY. There is an amendment to the amendment in line 10.

The SECRETARY. Committee amendments have been agreed to in line 10, after the word "whose," to insert "active;" in line 11 the words "on the active list" were stricken out and the words "in the Army, exclusive of service as a cadet at the United States Military Academy," were inserted; so that the last part of the section reads as follows:

This section shall apply to officers who have been retired on or since the 11th day of August, 1888, but shall not apply to any person whose active service in the Army, exclusive of service as a cadet at the United States Military Academy, does not exceed thirty-five years.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. PROCTOR. I wish the Senator would allow me a moment. There was an amendment made, I think, in line 5, by inserting the words "prior to April 9, 1865."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that, after the word "war," in line 5, the words "prior to April 9, 1865," were agreed to.

Mr. CULBERSON. I desire to ask the Senator from Vermont if the amendment has yet been adopted striking out section 37?

Mr. PROCTOR. In response to the question of the Senator from Texas I will state that the committee considered that a provision of this kind could not be properly matured and considered in connection with this bill, and that it could come up at any time as a separate measure. There is no immediate action proposed under it, and it was thought better not to incorporate it in this bill. There was no adverse action upon it in committee, but it was thought better to defer affirmative action.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will ask the Senator from Vermont if he will not pass for the present the Senate committee amendment striking out section 37? I am looking into the matter and am not prepared at this moment, as my attention has just been called to it, and I should like to inquire into it a little further.

Mr. PROCTOR. There is no objection to that course.

Mr. TELLER. I ask the Senator to allow section 31 to stand over. I have an amendment which I wish to offer. I might offer it now, I suppose.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. What page?

Mr. TELLER. Page 40. It is quite impossible to say what the Senator's amendment is from hearing it read, or how the section will stand. If after the section is perfected and printed I shall have the same right that I now have I shall not insist upon proceeding now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's rights will be protected.

Mr. TELLER. There is an amendment, which I have offered, to strike out the whole section.

Mr. ALLISON. Section 31?

Mr. TELLER. Section 31, and to insert one which I have prepared. I have prepared that with reference to some of the officers who have retired under the thirty-years act.

Mr. ALLISON. Has it been printed?

Mr. TELLER. It has been printed.

Mr. COCKRELL. Has section 31 been passed over?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments proposed by the committee have been agreed to, as the Chair is informed.

Mr. COCKRELL. My understanding is that the committee authorized the offering of another amendment, and I now offer it, to come in at the end of the amendment already agreed to.

But this act shall not apply to any officer who has been placed on the retired list by virtue of any special act of Congress.

Mr. ALLISON. Is that to be inserted at the end of section 31?

Mr. COCKRELL. I want it to come in at the end of section 31.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment submitted from the committee will be reported.

The SECRETARY. On page 40, line 7, after the words "thirty-five years," it is proposed to insert the following:

But this act shall not apply to any officer who has been placed on the retired list by virtue of any special act of Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to have that section read as the committee want it perfected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The section will be read as amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 31. That any officer of the Army now on the active list below the grade of brigadier-general who served during the civil war prior to April 9, 1865, shall, when retired, be retired with the rank and pay of the next higher grade, except such officers as may be retired under section 29 of this act. This section shall apply to officers who have been retired on or since the 11th day of August, 1888, but shall not apply to any officer whose active service in the Army, exclusive of service as a cadet at the United States Military Academy, does not exceed thirty-five years. But this act shall not apply to any officer who has been placed on the retired list by virtue of any special act of Congress.

Mr. PROCTOR. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to one point. I think there is a little addition to his amendment. It was not in my charge, and I speak only from memory. I think there was a further provision that it should not apply to any officer who had received an additional grade on his retirement.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is right. Offer it now.

Mr. PROCTOR. Will the Senator put that in?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the Senator offer it at the end of the amendment.

Mr. SPOONER. What do you mean by that?

Mr. COCKRELL. There are a number of officers on the retired list who have already received this grade.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRELL. And if they have, they ought not to have it again.

Mr. TELLER. There are a great many who have not received it who ought to receive it under this bill.

Mr. BACON. I judge by the very numerous limitations that this provision is designed to meet the requirements of certain individuals—I may be in error about that—or, if not certain individuals, of a certain particular class. Doubtless the Military Committee are correct in what they propose to do, but they know what the effect of it will be; we do not; and I think it is due to us that the committee should with perfect frankness disclose to us how many will be benefited by this provision; whether it is so framed that it will cover a general class, meritorious, or whether it will be so limited as to be enjoyed by a very few.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, this provision applies to 268 officers. It is——

Mr. BACON. I will state to the Senator that so far as I am concerned that statement is sufficient for me. I do not know about others.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri proposes to amend the amendment just adopted. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The Secretary read as follows:

But this act shall not apply to any officer who has been placed on the retired list by virtue of any special act of Congress or to any officer who has already received such higher grade.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I wish to secure, if I can, in this amendment a provision that it shall apply to those who served thirty years. I wish to know whether the committee are going to allow that to come in or whether they are going to object to it. If they are going to object to it, I wish to present my amendment, and I am prepared to present some reasons why I think this is a very invidious distinction that they are making.

Mr. PROCTOR. The committee deemed that it would be unwise to extend the amendment any further at this time. An officer retires at thirty years only at his own request. It is not compulsory retirement. He retires because he wishes to engage in business or because for some reason he thinks it is to his advantage to retire. There is no compulsory retirement after thirty years of service. After forty years of service he may be retired by the President without his consent, and at 64 years of age he is retired by operation of law.

The committee deemed that it was unwise to extend the provision any further. We know just how many officers are affected by it. It covers those who had service in the civil war and in the late wars. While, of course, the committee individually recognize that there are a good many worthy officers who do not come within the provision, it seemed that this was quite as far as we ought to go at this time certainly.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, this provision is drawn ex industria for the purpose of taking care of certain men and certain men only, and it is an act of great injustice that men who have served a limited time and who have been retired should get this advantage and men who have served a long time and been retired under other conditions should not get it.

What the Senator says about retirement under the thirty-years act may be technically true, but he knows very well that a large number of officers have retired under the thirty-years act who could have retired under the disability act. There was no distinction made between a retirement under the disability act and a retirement under the thirty-years act. A retirement under the thirty-years act could be readily accomplished. Under the other act you must call a board and there must be consideration by the board and much delay, and frequently some expense to the party.

Mr. President, I have in my hand a memorandum of one officer at least who sat down and wrote to the Department that he was entitled to return under the disability act. He entered the civil war at the very commencement and had gone through the civil war as a volunteer. He had then been put in the Regular Army. He had served for years on the frontier, and his total service was over thirty years. He stated to the Department that he was so incapacitated by rheumatism, which had followed him for several years, that he could no longer render the service the Government had a right to expect of him, and he ought to be retired under that act. If he told the truth in the letter which was written at that time he was entitled then to be retired under the act. He was retired under the thirty years' act as a consequence. He gets nothing but a colonel's pay, while men who entered the Academy at Westpoint after he had served ten or a dozen years in the United States Army come in under the provisions of this proposed act and secure the pay of the additional grade.

Mr. President, I am going to read a memorandum. I do not care about bringing in these officers' names. They are all sensitive about those things. I happen to know this gentleman very well.

It is suggested to me that a man might serve during the whole civil war and be on the active list going from the Volunteer Army into the Regular Army, and still not fall within this provision. That is the fact, and I am going to show it before I get through.

Appointed from civil life first lieutenant, Fifteenth United States Infantry, and made regimental quartermaster; served during civil war in various capacities with regiment in Army of the Cumberland, and on staff duty as provost-marshal Chattanooga, Tenn.; acting assistant adjutant-general, inspector of District of Etowah, and at close of war inspector of the Department of Georgia, from which he was relieved in December, 1865, to join his company and regiment. Served until fall of 1870 during reconstruction times in the Southern States, commanding at different times the posts at Atlanta, Ga., Augusta, Ga., Fort Morgan, Ala., and being stationed at other posts. Stationed at Davids Island, New York Harbor, from fall of 1870 till spring of 1872, when he went in command of his company to the Yellowstone River (marching from Fort Rice, on Missouri River), during which time he was in a number of interesting little skirmishes with Sitting Bull. Served at Fort D. A. Russell, Wyo., and Camp Sternburgh until July, 1874, when he went with regiment to Arizona, where, off and on, he served about eight years, and where he performed very arduous service. After four years in Arizona, he was two years in San Francisco on recruiting service; then back to Arizona; then to Fort Pembina, in Dakota, for four years, where the temperature each winter was 45° below zero; then back to Arizona, with 115° in the shade. He finally wound up as colonel Nineteenth Infantry, at Fort Wayne, Mich., but his health had been so impaired by hard work on the frontier that he was no longer fit for service in the field, and therefore applied for retirement under section 1243, Revised Statutes.

I have here on my desk a certified copy of this officer's letter that he wrote detailing to the Department why he wanted to retire from the Army. He stated that he had spent some time at the Hot Springs and had received some relief there, but he felt that he could no longer endure the hardships of military life. This man was brevetted a major for gallant and meritorious service in the battle of Missionary Ridge, Tennessee. He was brevetted lieutenant-colonel for gallant services in action against the Indians in Arizona on various occasions. He has a record that is as good as anybody's, and this man, who is incapacitated for active service on account of his health, is shut out by this provision which the Military Committee, without any reason under the heavens that I can see, insist shall not be amended so as to give him an opportunity as it would give to certain others, I admit.

Mr. SPOONER. When was he transferred to the Regular Army?

Mr. TELLER. He was transferred to the Regular Army after the war. I do not know whether the date is shown here or not. I am told that most of these people came to the Regular Army about 1866.

Mr. President, I have another case here to which I wish to call attention. A soldier entered the Army from Michigan June 10, 1861, and was discharged August 16, 1862, for a severe wound in the head received at Malvern Hill. As soon as he recovered he reenlisted. He might have stayed out of the Army, but he returned to the Army as sergeant-major. He returned September 6, 1862, having been discharged August 16, 1862. He was a sergeant-major September 6, 1862, captain November 21, 1862, and was honorably mustered out of the Army October 12, 1865. He was a captain, United States Army, July 28, 1866, on the recommendation of Generals Sheridan, Hancock, Franklin, Custer, Stedman, and others. He was retired in 1868 for disabilities from wound in line of duty, brevetted major, United States Army, for gallant and meritorious services in the assault at Port Hudson, June 14, 1863, nearly a year after he had been almost mortally wounded at Malvern Hill.

Mr. SPOONER. How long was he on the active list of the Regular Army?

Mr. TELLER. He was only two years on the active list. He would like to have stayed on the active list, if he had been capacitated, but he said he could not stay because of his disability. Any person who is acquainted with this officer and his record will, I believe, say without any hesitation that there are few men on the Army roll, no matter what their service may have been, who are better entitled to be considered under this generous provision of the Government toward the old soldiers than that major.

I have another statement here that I wish to read. It is a memorandum made by an officer. I do not know whether he cares about having his name mentioned. I know him; Senators know him. I believe he would not get any benefit from this act as it is. He gives a reason why this provision should be changed.

Between January 1, 1861, and August 1, 1866, the number of general officers, exclusive of staff departments and corps, of the Regular Army was increased from 1 major-general and 3 brigadier-generals to 1 general, 1 lieutenant-general, 5 major-generals, and 10 brigadier-generals—this is a Regular Army officer and he always has served in the regulars—an increase of 1 general, 1 lieutenant-general, 4 major-generals, and 7 brigadier-generals, constituting 13 original vacancies. During the period the major-generals and brigadier-generals who left the active list led to casual vacancies, which were increased by the appointment of some of the remaining general officers to higher grades. All of the appointments were given to distinguished officers who, after appointment, served for a considerable time. As a result promotion was relatively slow—he is a Westpoint man—and numerous regular officers who had been major-generals and brigadier-generals of volunteers during the civil war of four years had to stand in the regular establishment as colonels and lieutenant-colonels, and several as majors. Thus was the subject rested. Some of the officers subsequently became generals; others died without promotion, and others stand to-day on the retired lists as colonels and in lower grades.

In May, 1897, prior to the Spanish war of a few months—insignificant when compared with the momentous civil war of four years—a new method, coupled with good intention, was observed as to the appointment of general officers. Vacancies, through retirements, happened in the grade of major-general. Two brigadier-generals were appointed major-generals, and within eight days both of them were retired, at their own requests, without having been assigned to duty. In June two colonels were appointed brigadier-generals and similarly retired.

After the commencement of the Spanish-American war the method of using vacancies, caused by retirements, for several promotions was continued, with the result that 13 officers were appointed brigadier-generals, and, without assignment to duty, all of them were retired very soon after their appointments.

Mr. President, I do not mean to complain of that, and I do not know that anyone does; but I do think that when we could go to the extent of making colonels brigadiers for the express purpose, and the only purpose, and the admitted purpose of giving them an increased rank upon which to retire, we ought to do justice to some of these men who have been on the retired list at the low rank of captain and major and lieutenant-colonel for many years, who had quite as much service as those whom we thus signally promoted, and in some instances very much more.

The effect of such appointments has been to disturb the equipoise of the retired list, in that juniors in rank, service, and age have been placed on the retired list and made seniors in rank to officers of the civil war who had been previously retired. Of the juniors so placed not one was a brigadier-general of volunteers during the civil war; three were brigadier-generals of volunteers by brevet. Among the colonels thus made juniors the 1900 Army Register lists many colonels, in their order of retirement, with periods of service ranging from forty-three to sixty-two years, against periods of service of forty-two years or less for their former juniors. And, moreover, the class of colonels, as cited, had gained in the majority of cases the "highest assignable rank" by brevet of major-general, brigadier-general, or colonel in the Regular Army during the civil war; and in addition many of them during that war held the rank of major-general, brigadier-general, or colonel of volunteers; and the Department made juniors of some people who did not serve in the civil war at all. At least there can be found one or two instances of that kind, I know.

Striking instances are apparent in the cases of Col. John G. Parke, who died recently, as you will recollect, who was a brigadier-general and major-general of volunteers, commanded an army corps, and in 1865 brevetted major-general, United States Army; Col. Wager Swayne, who was brigadier-general and major-general of volunteers, and after the war colonel Forty-fifth United States Infantry, and major-general, by brevet, United States Army. He lost his right leg in battle.

If we pass to the list of retired brigadier-generals, we have the prominent cases of Horatio G. Wright and David S. Stanley. Both had commanded army corps and have brilliant records. Getty, Stanley, Abbott, and there may have been others, endeavored to get Congress to legislate them higher rank, but failed. They went upon the retired list with the rank they then held in the Regular Army. Since then we have superseded them with men who had not seen any such service or rendered any such service to the Government as they rendered.

Mr. President, I want to stop here a moment and say that this Army bill was drawn in the Army office, and it was drawn to take care of the pets of the Army. It has no intention, in my judgment (if it has, it absolutely fails), to do justice to the men who are entitled to justice here, if any men are. The crippled soldiers who were retired at an early day because of their disabilities, who would have rather continued in the service, and if they had continued in the service would have received higher rank and higher pay—in other words, Mr. President, the men who took their lives in their hands in the desperate fight and went to the front and were wounded and disabled are put below the men who either by fortune or otherwise escaped unhurt.

I have on my table here a letter from a man who was nine times wounded, and brevetted on various occasions for his service in the Army, who was retired as a captain, and who will remain as a captain under this bill, while men who never saw an hour's service in the civil war were promoted from time to time and became colonels and are receiving colonel's retired pay.

Mr. President, if this bill passes it ought to pass so as to do justice not to a few men selected by somebody at the War Department, but to do justice to the men who are entitled to it by virtue of their service; and if occasionally you should give to some man who is not entitled to it, it is better to do that than that you should deny it to the great body of the men who were retired in the early days for disability and who are entitled to it.

The disturbance of the equipoise is not confined to the brigadiers and colonels. It involves the lieutenant-colonels, majors, and lieutenants—many wounded in line of duty, and a number losing legs, arms, or feet—because promotion on the active list, due to the promotions of major-generals and brigadier-generals, under the recent and well-intended method, as recited, have advanced some officers on the active list, and that advancement will pass to their advantage when they shall have reached retirement.

The unintentional injustice done to the retired officers of the civil war, as indicated by the foregoing, should be remedied; and liberal action of the Congress should be extended to that end.

And then the writer adds:

The amendment proposed will, if adopted by the Congress, extend in part the desired relief.

He then referred to the amendment offered by the President pro tempore of the Senate [Mr. FRYE], which was then pending. It was not complete in all respects, because it did not do justice to the men who had been retired under the thirty years' provision.

Mr. President, I wish to read one or two memoranda that I have here. Where a gentleman has written and sent his name I do not feel any hesitation in reading it:

DEAR SIR: Section 31 of the House bill for the reorganization of the Army, as amended by the Senate committee, among other things, provides—

This is a letter dated at Salt Lake City, Utah, December 31, 1900—

"This section shall apply to officers retired on or since the 11th day of August, 1891, but shall not apply to any officer whose service on the active list does not extend thirty-five years." This proviso as to length of service on the active list precludes me from the benefit of the act and does me what I consider an injustice. In support of this assertion I beg to submit the following facts, viz:

As a native of Virginia, and while still a very young man, I entered the Union Army as first lieutenant, Third West Virginia Cavalry, in 1862, and was regularly promoted and served in every grade up to lieutenant-colonel, being brevetted colonel and brigadier-general for gallant and meritorious services during the Shenandoah campaign of 1864 and the final campaign around Richmond and Petersburg in 1865 (see pages 220 and 356, Army Register, 1900); was honorably mustered out of the service June 30, 1865.

August 30, 1880, President Hayes, of his own volition, appointed me major and paymaster, United States Army. I accepted and served faithfully as such until September 8, 1899, the date of my retirement on account of disability incident to the service, a period of nineteen years.

During this entire time I held the rank of major, while numbers of officers who were captains when I reentered the service in 1880 were regularly promoted to the grades of brigadier and major general. At the date of my retirement, September 8, 1899, I ranked every major in the Army except two paymasters.

Notwithstanding these facts and the further fact that numbers of officers have been recently promoted to the rank of major, colonel, and brigadier-general, and immediately retired, who had not reached the retiring age, and who were in the enjoyment of good health.

And it is now proposed, as shown by the list of officers furnished by the Secretary of War to the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, that 280 more officers on the active list are to be promoted on their retirement under the bill in its present shape, 73 of this number being colonels who will thus be made brigadier-generals, who the record shows only served on an average some five years as majors and three to four years as lieutenant-colonels, though it is true that their promotion up to this time had been slow.

Notwithstanding under the provisions of the bill in its present shape myself and other officers similarly situated are excluded from its benefits.

These being the facts, as can be verified by the official records—

Mr. President, I have verified this—and having honestly and faithfull served my Government as an officer on the active list in time of war and peace for over twenty-one years, and my record during this long service being without stain or blemish, I confidently appeal to your sense of justice and right to see to it that the clause in section 31 of the bill which reads "That the benefit of the act shall not apply to an officer on the retired list unless he shall have served thirty-five years on the active list," be stricken out or amended so as to give me the rank and pay of lieutenant-colonel on the retired list, which I have most justly earned.

He says:

In making the above statement as to my case I do not wish to be understood as advocating the passage of the Army bill now under consideration. I simply desire that I be not unjustly discriminated against should the same be enacted into law.

I am, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

J. S. WITCHER,
Major, U. S. A., Retired, Brevet Brigadier-General, U. S. V.

Mr. PROCTOR. A paymaster?

Mr. TELLER. A paymaster, but he had service. Under this act there will be some men retired who have not served in the civil war. I have a memorandum which was handed me by a retired Army officer, in which he says:

There are now on the retired list 153 officers, who retired with increased grades, who did not serve in the civil war; 15 majors, 52 captains, and 37 first lieutenants who entered the Army after the close of the civil war.

I have gone over the Army Register, and I find men retired with this increased grade who entered the Academy at Westpoint after the civil war had closed.

Mr. COCKRELL. Your amendment would include them?

Mr. TELLER. My amendment would not interfere with the people who are on the retired list, but would take in many who are now cut out by this particular provision of the law.

Mr. PROCTOR. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. PROCTOR. I understood the Senator to say that the provision of the committee included men who did not serve in the civil war.

Mr. TELLER. I think it might include them.

Mr. PROCTOR. The language is intended to be specific, and to apply to those who served during the civil war.

Mr. TELLER. I believe that is now so. What I had in view was that, at the time the Senator first introduced the amendment, those officers might have been only perfunctorily performing service, because they might have entered after the war actually ended; but if the Senator takes that out the difficulty is obviated.

There are two or three other matters I wish to refer to. I want to call attention to the fact that the Army Register is full of the names of men who entered the civil war, who went through the civil war, held high commands in the Army during the civil war, and then went into the Regular Army and were retired for disability or retired after thirty years' service, who are not promoted to this additional bounty, while men who were not then in the Army, who had not had four years' service, who had not yet entered the Military Academy at Westpoint, afterwards going there and coming out, are now on the retired list with a grade above that of these men, and besides an additional grade. I have a letter from a retired officer on the list who has the service that he claims, for I have looked up his record in the Army Register. He says:

I may view the situation from the standpoint of personal interest, but can see no good reason why officers whose good fortune it was to escape the effects of shot and shell during the civil war, so that they could serve in the war with Spain, should be retired with increased rank, and the officers whose disabilities resulting from wounds received in the prior and much greater war, that compelled their earlier retirement, should not be treated with the same consideration.

I was wounded nine times, and received six brevets for gallant and meritorious conduct in battle, and believe myself entitled to as much reward as any officer who escaped all injury during the war of the rebellion and lived in health and strength to serve in the war with Spain.

Very truly, yours,

SAM'L K. SCHWENK,
Captain and Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel, U. S. A., Brevet Brigadier-General of Volunteers.

Mr. President, there is one other thing I think I ought to state. The retired Army officers of the civil war are naturally older men than those who have retired since—those who entered the Military Academy at Westpoint, as I said, after these men had their four years' service and sometimes have had ten years' service either in the volunteer or the regular force. These old men are disappearing much more rapidly from the rolls than the new men.

I have here some memoranda furnished me by an officer who is a retired captain. He was a volunteer private. He became a regular after the civil war, and was retired because he did not have the good fortune to get at the head of the list.

A large number of captains who reached the head of the list, who got there by accident, who got there by the deaths of others on the list, were promoted when other men who served much longer and were retired practically at the same time, but not standing at the head of the list, were retired only with the rank in which they then served, while the men who succeeded in getting to the head of the list—which is no indication of superior merit or superior service—were retired with a higher grade.

Mr. PROCTOR. With the permission of the Senator, I will suggest to him that his amendment would give this additional grade to certain men who have already received an additional grade.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator can amend it in any way to prevent that. It was not intended to do that.

Mr. PROCTOR. Those who have got to the head of the list and on examination are considered fit to take the higher grade will not be excluded.

Mr. TELLER. Very well. If the Senator will accept my amendment, he can make that amendment to it.

Mr. PROCTOR. I merely wanted to call the Senator's attention to it.

Mr. TELLER. I did not, of course, intend to give anybody an increased grade who had it; but it is intended, if I can succeed in having the amendment adopted, to give to these people what I think is justice, and to prevent what I think would be a scandalous favoritism by enabling one man, who has rendered no more efficient service, to be their superior in rank and their superior in pay.

A retired officer sent the memoranda to me which I am going to read. I happen to know him and to know something of his record. He says:

In the ordinary course of events the old soldier is fast passing away. The officers who served during the war between the States are nearly all on the shady side of 58, most of whom are far beyond that, and many of whom are supporting large families and eking out a precarious existence on the pittance received by them on the retired list of the Army.

I want to say that this officer retired as a captain, and retired as a captain simply because in doing his duty as an officer he had received wounds which incapacitated him for longer remaining in the Army. There is no demerit, Mr. President, in an officer being retired when he is incapacitated from longer staying in the Army. There is no special merit in an officer who, escaping the shot and shell in battle and who has not been broken down by arduous labor, can longer remain. There is nothing in the mere length of service which ought to entitle such an officer to rank over the man who was disabled and disqualified, and not only disabled and disqualified from staying in the Army, but disabled and disqualified from following the ordinary pursuits of life, as many of these officers have been.

As to what inroads death is making among them the following comparative statement of the deaths among them and those on the active list will show; and it should be remembered that the retired list is carrying a large number of young officers, and that a large proportion of the deaths occur among those officers who served from 1861 to 1865.

The proportionate rate of deaths among those on the active list and those on the retired list will appear by the following list taken from the Army Register for the years 1890 to 1897, the number on both the active and retired lists being given:

Year.	Active list.			Retired list.
	Number of men.	Number of deaths.	Deaths per 1,000.	Number of men.	Number of deaths.	Deaths per 100.
1890	2,170	20	11	501	26	5
1891	2,169	38	18	548	31	6¼
1892	2,159	14	7	582	33	6¼
1893	2,156	22	11	665	28	6¼
1894	2,159	17	9	665	32	5¼
1895	2,145	23	11	624	25	4
1896	2,148	23	11	653	40	6¼
1897	2,164	18	8¼	663	46	7¼

This list shows the average death rate of those on the retired list to be 6 to 100, while the death rate on the active list shows an average of less than 2 to the 100, and in the nature of human events the death rate is much greater among the older officers who served during the war of the rebellion.

At the same rate of mortality, if no more retirements were made, the entire retired list, so far as relates to this class of officers, would become extinct in about fourteen years. It will not be a great while before all those officers who saw service during the rebellion will have passed beyond the river. These veteran officers are now stricken in years, with increased responsibilities and diminished ability to provide for themselves and families. Many of them have been retired without promotion when within a very few numbers of the head of the list, when a year or two more service would have brought promotion, with increased rank and pay on retirement.

By reference to the Army Register it will be observed that there are 15 majors, 52 captains, and 37 first lieutenants who entered the Army after the close of the war between the States and who never saw field service, but who have been retired, many of whom were promoted over the heads of the gallant officers who served during that war.

That an injustice has been done to these officers and that they are deserving of some relief is admitted on all sides. The Adjutant-General, in his letter of January 25, 1898, speaking on this subject, says:

The officers now in service who might reasonably expect some consideration are those who, notwithstanding long, faithful, and meritorious service, including that rendered in the late war, have not reached a grade higher than that of captain. Congress seems to have recognized such claims by the passage of a number of special bills for the benefit of officers of meritorious service so circumstanced, and many bills for this purpose have been introduced from time to time for the benefit of various officers that have not received favorable consideration. Equity would seem to require that some consideration should be extended to meritorious officers who served during the war and since who, notwithstanding a long active service, have reached only the grade of captain or lieutenant. Some of these have been retired and others are closely verging on retirement, either through disability contracted in the service or on account of the age limit. Some of these officers have received but scant promotion for their merit and length of service and would seem entitled to some consideration above that enjoyed by those of their comrades who have joined the Army since the close of the great contest between the States. Much might be said in favor of so distinguishing and rewarding those having meritorious service during the war and since. Such action would be in line with the custom of most European countries of adding one grade to the rank of an officer of long and distinguished service upon his transfer from the active to the inactive list, which is apt to be a painful transition. I think a bill drawn to reward the captains and lieutenants who are now on the retired list after prolonged active service, including that rendered during the late war through disability contracted in the service, or through retirement on account of age after long, meritorious, and substantially continuous service commencing in the war, might fairly claim some consideration from Congress.

That is an extract from a letter of the Adjutant-General with reference to another bill, not to this bill. That bill provides for something different.

The principle involved in such legislation has received the unqualified indorsement of General Grant, General Sherman, General Sheridan, General Hancock, General Doubleday, General Upton, General Smith, General Gibbon, Secretary of War Ramsey, and others.

It should be borne in mind that the proposed legislation will not increase the number on the retired list. It will only benefit the officers who served during the war between the States who are now on the retired list, and those on the active list who so served when retired.

The number of deaths during the year 1898 up to December — is as follows:

Active list 72
Retired list 25

There were 2,164 officers on the active list at the beginning of the present year, the percentage of deaths being a little in excess of 3 to the 100, while the retired list, which contains 660, shows the percentage of deaths to be about 4 to the 100, thus showing the percentage of deaths to be greater among retired officers, notwithstanding the fact that the active list has just passed through a war of several months.

Should this measure become a law? There are now on the retired list 162 captains, 61 first lieutenants, and 8 second lieutenants who would be benefited by its provisions, less the number of deaths which have occurred during the past year, and it would require an appropriation of about $125,000 for the first year. This amount, according to the percentage of deaths among retired officers, will decrease about 12 per cent during the next year, and the percentage will be much larger each succeeding year as the officers grow older, and it will be but a very few years at most when the appropriation would lapse for the want of beneficiaries.

Mr. ALLISON. I should be glad to have the Senator read again the number of officers that would be affected by his amendment and not included by the amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs, and the amount that would be paid to them for the first year.

Mr. TELLER. This was handed to me, as I stated, by an officer whom I know very well, who, after a good many years of arduous service both in the Regular Army and in the Volunteers during the civil war, was retired, and who is receiving now the magnificent sum of $1,800 a year from the United States, while men with no greater service and no greater claim upon the Government are receiving the pay of a brigadier-general, because they were influential enough or had enough influential friends to promote them to that high office before the time came at which they were compelled to retire. This officer says:

Should this measure—

I suppose he means my amendment, for he was then considering another amendment which is practically the same as mine, except that I have included in mine the thirty years' service provision.

Should this measure become a law, there are now on the retired list 162 captains, 61 first lieutenants, and 8 second lieutenants who would be benefited by its provisions, less the number of deaths which have occurred during the past year, and it would require an appropriation of about $125,000 for the first year.

Then he says that that, of course, would be a decreasing sum every year. He then says:

It would seem but just and equitable that the action of the Government should be uniform and impartial in the application of general principles to all officers of the Army, and especially so in the case of those officers who served from 1861 to 1865.

It may be added that the number of deaths among officers on the retired list who served during the civil war, during the year 1899, was 37, while the number of deaths among officers on that list who did not serve during that war was only 2, thus showing much greater mortality among those who served during that period than among those who did not so serve.

It may be further added that there are now on the retired list 153 officers who were retired with an increased grade, but who did not serve during the civil war.

Now, Mr. President, I want to know whether this committee are going to stand here and say that the men who have rendered distinguished service and who have held high commands, and because of their disabilities were compelled to get out of office, shall not be provided for, and that those who went as cadets to Westpoint after the war closed and have come in nearly ten years afterwards shall be placed on the retired list with this increased bounty of the Government. If there ever was a just proposition presented to the Senate, it is that these men shall be put upon an equality. If there is anything that is disgraceful to this nation, it is the attempt to give to one class of its soldiers a preference and advantage which their public services and merits do not require, do not demand, and do not justify.

Mr. SEWELL. Will the Senator allow me a moment as to the statement he has just made that there were 158 officers——

Mr. TELLER. One hundred and fifty-three.

Mr. SEWELL. One hundred and fifty-three officers who were not in the civil war who have been retired at an advanced grade?

Mr. TELLER. Yes, with advanced grade; and I have two statements made by two different officers to the same effect.

Mr. SEWELL. I should like to have that statement verified, because I do not know of it. I am sure it does not come from the War Department.

Mr. TELLER. If any man stood at the head of the list of captains and he had not been in the service more than six weeks—that, perhaps, is not probable—but if he had not been more than six weeks at the head of the list of captains he got an additional grade.

Mr. SEWELL. I know the Senator has made that statement, and of course it is honestly made, but where it comes from I do not know—that there were 153 officers who were not in the civil war and who have been retired with higher grade under the operation of law.

Mr. PROCTOR. Will the Senator allow me to answer the question?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. PROCTOR. I know of no class of officers who were retired with this increased grade except under a general law passed some ten years ago, when promotion was exceedingly slow, and when there were first lieutenants who had served over twenty-five years as lieutenants before reaching their captaincies. A law was passed that when a man reached the head of the list and was entitled by his rank to the next promotion, but upon examination it was found that he was physically disqualified for that promotion, he was retired at the advanced grade which he would have received in due course of promotion except for his physical disqualification.

Mr. SEWELL. Then, those men were retired for disability?

Mr. PROCTOR. It was retirement for disability, but I would not suppose that the number could be nearly so large as stated, because I know during my experience it was not often the case.

Mr. TELLER. I will insist that that statement is correct. If the Senator wants to verify it, he can verify it. I have made that statement on the authority of two officers who, distinct from each other, have gone over the record and who are interested in the matter.

Mr. PROCTOR. That is retirement for disability?

Mr. TELLER. It is retirement for disability, of course; but there are men who have had larger service, longer service, and more arduous service, who did not succeed in getting to the head of the list, though they were the superiors in service of the men who secured the advanced grade. One man might get to be a captain in his regiment while another might remain a lieutenant for years.

Mr. SEWELL. I suppose the Senator does not mean to charge that there is any favoritism about that?

Mr. TELLER. Oh, no; I do not mean to charge the committee with any favoritism.

Mr. SEWELL. Or the Department.

Mr. TELLER. I regret that the committee does not see that this is a fair and just thing to do, and does not allow it. It seems to me that there are not two sides to this question.

Mr. President, I want to show how unjust this bill was as it originally came to us, and, if it is changed, it must be by amendment here.

I have here a brief military history of Col. Daniel W. Benham, of the United States Army. He was born in Ohio in 1837 and enlisted early in 1861 to subdue the rebellion. He was honorably discharged after ninety days' service and reenlisted. He was appointed lieutenant, October 18, 1861, and served during the civil war in numerous battles. He entered the Regular Army early in the civil war. He served during that war and after that war. He also served in the Spanish war, and was commended by his officers for excellent service. He likewise served on the frontier. I have here a list of the very numerous battles in which he was engaged. He retired July 23, 1898, and retired just at a time when this bill, after all that service from 1861 to 1898—I do not know whether purposely or not—leaves him out.

A gentleman has sent me this:

> Some officers of my acquaintance retired after thirty years' service (section 1243 R. S.), because the hard service they had performed, together with the unhealthy climates where they had been stationed, had impaired their health and made them unable to perform field duty. They could have gone before a board and been retired for disability, when they would have received the benefits of the amendment, but they supposed it to be as honorable to retire under one law as another.

That does not come from the gentleman whose case I have particularly mentioned who had such arduous service on the frontier.

Mr. President, I know something about these Army officers on the frontier. Amongst my acquaintances is an officer who is a captain yet. I do not know how long it will be before he will be anything more than a captain—at least, I have not heard of his being promoted. He will be promoted whenever his major dies or whenever his major gets out of the Army, and he will not be promoted until that occurs. This officer has served in all the Indian wars for thirty years. He has served from the very extreme northern part of the United States to the extreme southern part, and I have had occasion to know of his service in the West for many years. When he retires he will undoubtedly retire as a captain, because he is unfortunate enough to have a long-lived officer ahead of him, which prevents his promotion.

Mr. President, I am going to call the attention of the Senate to certain cases, because I am afraid if I do not the Senator from Vermont will rather question some of my suggestions that you have some young men on the retired list. I do not mean to say that they ought not to be there, but they ought not to be there ahead of other people. On page 217 of the Army Register amongst those retired from active service I find John O. Skinner, who entered the Army in 1874. You will find by going down the line a gentleman who entered as cadet July 1, 1860, and so of course did not see much of the civil war, coming out in 1864, and who is on the retired list as a major. If you go down to the bottom of the list, you will find a gentleman there who entered the Army in 1861, served until 1865, then went to Westpoint and was graduated there, and has been retired as a major. He did not have anybody who could secure his nomination as a lieutenant-colonel or colonel and then as a brigadier.

Mr. President, you will find on page 216 of the Register the name of Robert Craig, who entered Westpoint in July, 1862, and of course did not graduate until after the war was over. He retired as a lieutenant-colonel.

Mr. SEWELL. How many years did he serve?

Mr. TELLER. I am not finding any fault with it, but what I am complaining of is the inequality, that men who served longer than he did are retired at a lower rank and are denied this additional rank.

Mr. SEWELL. It has often occurred that there have been casualties in the artillery or the infantry or the cavalry branch during our Indian wars by which certain officers got ahead considerably faster.

Mr. TELLER. We all know that promotion is almost an accident. One man drops out and another one immediately succeeds him. Sometimes the vacancy is caused by death and sometimes by resignation, sometimes by sickness, sometimes by the fate of battle.

Mr. SEWELL. That is absolutely so.

Mr. TELLER. It is not a question of favoritism in promotion. There is not any there except when you reach the line of colonel. When 13 men were taken and put into the position of brigadier-general for the express purpose of being given the increased grade, I voted for the confirmation of every one of them, and was glad to do it. There were more than that—15.

Mr. SEWELL. I will say to the Senator that that was done, as he knows very well, because they were the oldest colonels in the service, and they were incapacitated as colonels practically by reason of their age. They were just going out, and they were given a chance of retirement to allow younger men to come into the commands.

Mr. TELLER. As I said to the Senator, I make no complaint. It was a wise and just thing to do.

Mr. SEWELL. It was done by the deliberate action of the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly; and thereby we said we want to reward these people. Now, I say you should not confine your reward to the colonels. The captain who would have been a colonel if he had not been disabled by the shot and shell of the enemy ought to be just as much under our care as the men who secured safety from the enemy and rose gradually, not to a place higher than he deserved, and perhaps not so high, and became a colonel. You take special care of him and have no care about the captain or lieutenant. That is what I complain of. In my judgment, this bill works an injustice upon very meritorious men. It is not an equitable bill in that particular, and this feature of it ought to be amended so that it shall take in these other people. I do not believe the American people will complain or criticise anybody who votes to put upon the Government of the United States an additional tax of $125,000 or $150,000 a year to do justice to these men.

Everybody knows that the civil war, unlike the last war with Spain, was a continuous war. There were men in the Army who fought every day, day by day, day by day, longer than the whole Spanish war lasted. Every day they were under fire and every night they were sleeping on the battlefield. There was in the history of the world no such war. For courage, for endurance, the world presented no parallel, simply because it was a fight between the great, vigorous Anglo-Saxons. It was a fight at home among our own people. You can not in modern times show battles like we fought during the civil war, both sides contending, not surrendering when fifteen or twenty of the regiment were killed, surrendering only when the great majority in many instances went down. There are instances in the war on both sides where a regiment was practically decimated and destroyed, rendered incapable almost of organization. I read the other day of a North Carolina regiment where practically every man in one of the companies, which held an important point, was either killed or wounded. That is the kind of men who were fighting in that war, and you are going to take care of the men who served a few days in the Spanish war and forget the men who fought during the great civil war, and demonstrated, as it had never been demonstrated before, the fighting character of the American race.

Mr. President, we are asking nothing but justice at the hands of the Government of the United States for these men, and we are asking it with full confidence, as I believe, that the American people will approve of what we will do in this particular. I do hope that the committee will not compel us to call the roll upon this, but will generously say that this amendment may be made and these worthy and deserving men may be taken care of in their old age.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, I do not propose to reply or to undertake to reply to what I consider the very unjust aspersion of the Senator from Colorado upon the War Department in regard to the preparation of this bill. It has not been prepared by the War Department any more than every such bill must be. We have looked to them for the facts. The committee took the bill that came to us from the House as a substitute or an amendment in that form for our bill of last winter. That is what they worked upon, and not the War Department bill. I wish to say for the work of the War Department that it has not been in the least respect one that favored any class, but that it has been conspicuously and remarkably impartial, not favoring any class, not favoring any staff department at the expense of another, but seeking to do, as no bill in my knowledge of War Department matters ever has, equal and impartial justice, giving each class as near as possible an equal opportunity for promotion.

Now, in regard to this measure, I have received many letters of the same tenor, some of them identical with those read by the Senator, from the same parties, and, without committing the members of the committee, I presume individually they would be glad to see all promotion given to those officers who served in the civil war that could be consistently given. Most of the members of the committee served in the civil war on one side or the other. I wish to have the Senate understand what they are doing by this. They are practically giving this increased grade to all officers who served in the civil war and who have been discharged for any reason.

The Senator gave the number on the retired list. There are two retired lists, the limited and the unlimited. I think he must have given only the limited list. I have not been able to get the figures, but in the Army Register the two lists occupy 81 pages and a fraction, and in running it over as carefully as I could I should think there must be 10 names on each page, and nearly all of them, except those who have already been retired with the rank of brigadier-general or with an increased grade, would come under this bill. I think it would add at least five or six hundred to the retired list. It would practically wipe out the limited list and put them all on the unlimited list.

What the Senator from Colorado said is very true—that there are a great many individuals who deserve this. I should be glad to have them have it. It is impossible to frame a general law of this kind that will not, unless we include everybody, exclude some whom we would be glad to include. The provision as reported by the Senate committee had been rejected from the House bill on the floor of the House. I think it is proper to state that fact. The Senate committee felt as though this was as far it was judicious to go at this time, but if the Senate choose to go further, I personally have no objection to make. I simply wish to have the Senate see how far they are going.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to say to the Senator that I am not mistaken about the retired list. When you take out the people who have already received this bounty, the list will be practically as I have stated.

Mr. COCKRELL. How many?

Mr. TELLER. I read it. I looked it over with the gentleman.

Mr. SEWELL. I will say to the Senator from Vermont, if he will allow me, with the permission of the Senator from Colorado, that while I was ordered to report this adversely, I have not done so, because I wanted to hear his argument on the subject. I am perfectly willing to-day, so far as I am individually concerned, if the remainder of the committee will consider it, to let the matter go over until to-morrow and until we get more information from the Department as to this list.

Mr. TELLER. Let it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the committee will get the statement of the War Department.

Mr. ALLISON. If this is going over until to-morrow, I hope that somebody connected with the committee will give us an accurate statement, or as nearly accurate as possible, as respects how many officers this will embrace, so as to verify what has already been stated by the Senator from Colorado. I find that the appropriation for retired pay of officers of the Army for last year was $1,273,000.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes; and it will be very much larger.

Mr. ALLISON. So this involves in the neighborhood of a very considerable sum.

Mr. COCKRELL. It will soon be nearly as large as the active list.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to ascertain, before I vote for this amendment, what it will require in the way of payment. Without discussing the question now, I think there is as much justice in the Senator's amendment as there is in the provision as it stands here.

Mr. PENROSE. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill as an original section or to be inserted where it may be more properly placed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania offers an amendment. Does he desire to have it read?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

Mr. PENROSE. I asked for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That can not be done. It will be read, printed, and lie on the table. That is all that can be done.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It has been printed.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask unanimous consent to have it considered now. I do not think there will be any objection to it. I have to leave the city this afternoon to be gone for several days. I ask to have it read and, if there is no objection, to have it considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of an amendment which he has offered to the bill.

Mr. PROCTOR. Let it be read.

Mr. PENROSE. My recollection is that it is an amendment which has been printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been printed. It will be read to the Senate for its information.

The SECRETARY. After section 41 it is proposed to insert:

SEC. 42. That the distinctive badges adopted by military societies of men "who served in the armies and navies of the United States during the Spanish-American war and the incident insurrection in the Philippines" may be worn upon all occasions of ceremony by officers and men of the Army and Navy of the United States who are members of said organizations in their own right.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I should like to inquire whether there is any law against it now.

Mr. PENROSE. The purpose is to remove the discrimination which now exists in favor of the officers of the Regular Army, by giving official recognition to the wearing of such decorations by volunteer officers. I may be wrong, but that is the information given to me when I was requested to introduce the amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY. I see no harm in it, but I do not see any absolute necessity for it. It seems to me those who are now out of the military service can wear the badges they please.

Mr. ALLISON. What is the rule as to those who served in the civil war?

Mr. HAWLEY. Societies?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes.

Mr. HAWLEY. They are so authorized.

Mr. ALLISON. By law?

Mr. HAWLEY. I think so.

Mr. PENROSE. This is simply to remove an unfair discrimination against volunteer officers. It is an amendment requested by every volunteer in the recent Spanish-American war.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to its consideration now? The Chair hears none, and the amendment is before the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania whether the soldiers of the civil war are now authorized by law to wear such badges? If they are, we ought to apply the same rule to these soldiers. If they are not, I do not see any occasion for the amendment.

Mr. PENROSE. I am under the impression that the soldiers of the civil war are so permitted, but I could not answer the Senator positively on that point. I know, however, that the soldiers of the Regular Army are so permitted, and their decorations are recognized by law, and if the veterans of the civil war are not so officially recognized, I will cheerfully permit an amendment to extend the scope of this amendment to them.

Mr. ALLISON. It ought to be.

Mr. HAWLEY. The members of the Military Order of the Loyal Legion, composed of officers, are authorized to wear badges.

Mr. ALLISON. By law?

Mr. HAWLEY. By law, I think.

Mr. PROCTOR. And the Grand Army of the Republic?

Mr. HAWLEY. And the Grand Army of the Republic. It is protected by existing law.

Mr. ALLISON. All right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENROSE. Now I ask the same favor of the Senate, as I have to leave the city in an hour. I ask consideration for the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as an additional section, the following:

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to have suitable medals of honor struck, to be presented to the volunteers, regulars, sailors, and marines who voluntarily remained on duty in the Philippines after their terms of service had expired, and for this purpose a sum sufficient is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. PENROSE. I offer the amendment in accordance with the message of the President recommending this legislation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to considering the amendment now?

Mr. PROCTOR. I should like the amendment to lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is objection.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Committee on Military Affairs will have a meeting in the morning, and we can settle it very easily.

Mr. PENROSE. All right. I only asked for its consideration because I shall not be present. If the chairman of the committee will see that it is brought up, I shall not press it now.

Mr. HAWLEY. We will have it considered.

Mr. PENROSE. I offer another amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as additional sections the following:

SEC. —. That any person or persons or employee of any corporation or company who shall in any manner place upon or attach to, or cause to be in any manner placed upon or attached to, the flag or coat of arms of the United States, or any imitation or representation thereof, any advertisement, trade-mark, label, inscription, words, design, or device, or any representation of any person or thing, or who shall exhibit, or display, or sell, or cause to be exhibited, displayed, or sold, or who shall hold in possession for exhibition, display, or sale, the flag or coat of arms of the United States, or any imitation or representation thereof whereon is placed, or to which is attached, any such advertisement, trade-mark, label, inscription, words, design, or device, or any representation of any person or thing, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor: Provided, That a national or State regiment or Grand Army post shall have the right to put upon the flag the name and number of such regiment or post.

SEC. —. Any person or persons, or employees of any corporation, or company, who shall imitate or represent, or cause to be imitated or represented, the flag or coat of arms of the United States as an advertisement, trade-mark, label, or device for exclusive or personal advantage, gain, or profit upon any material, article, goods, or merchandise, or who shall exhibit, display, or sell, or cause to be exhibited, displayed, or sold, or who shall hold in possession for exhibition, display, or sale, any material, article, goods, or merchandise, bearing, in any manner, any imitation or representation of the flag or coat of arms of the United States as an advertisement, trade-mark, label, or device for exclusive or personal advantage, gain, or profit, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor: Provided, however, That the devices now attached to the representation of the flag of the United States and used by the Grand Army of the Republic as the badge of their order may continue to be so used by them: Provided further, That any person, persons, or corporations now holding a copyright or trade-mark issued by the Librarian of Congress or Patent Commissioner upon which is the national flag shall cease using the same, and may have a new trade-mark in its place, of same design without said flag, or a new one in its stead, free of Government fee.

SEC. —. Any person or persons who shall tear down, trample upon, or treat with indignity, wantonly deface, or destroy the flag or coat of arms of the United States, or any imitation or representation thereof, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

SEC. —. That any person or the employees of any corporation or company violating any provisions of sections — — — of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $100 for the first offense and $500 for each subsequent offense.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the amendment?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I rose for the purpose of making an objection, and I should like to state the reasons why I make it. That subject has nothing to do with the Army reorganization. It is entirely an independent matter. It is a matter which has given rise to a good deal of discussion as to the proper bill which should be passed to prevent what is called the desecration of the flag. It has to be very carefully considered. I do not think there is any proper time for it to be considered now, nor do I think it is in order on this bill. Therefore I object.

Mr. PENROSE. If I may be permitted by unanimous consent, I will state that there are several bills to this effect pending in the Senate. Congress has been about fifteen years holding under consideration the subject of flag legislation and has accomplished nothing practical. According to military regulations every private and every officer is compelled to salute the American flag. It is part of the military regulations. It seems to me it is pertinent to this measure that it should be protected from desecration and from being used for commercial and advertising purposes.

I know that this legislation is overwhelmingly demanded by the patriotic sentiment of this country and is particularly demanded by the soldiers of the late Spanish-American war. If there is any bill at all in which it can be properly inserted, it is the present measure. It is unpopular in some sections of the country, and to insert this item, instead of hurting the bill, in my opinion would greatly strengthen it. It would be an assertion before the whole country that this army is for the usual purposes of patriotic national defense, not for the sordid purposes which have been attributed to it by those opposed to the creation of a standing army of this size. It seems to me that the wisest thing the Senate could do would be to insert this amendment.

As to the details of the amendment, I have taken the bills introduced by the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] and the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. QUARLES], and I have carefully compiled the amendment from those two bills, one of the bills containing certain provisions which the other omitted. So I believe that it is a well-considered and a carefully worded piece of legislation. I hope the Senate will adopt it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the amendment is not now before the Senate. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that that is the end of the committee amendments.

Mr. PENROSE. I offer an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask to have printed and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed and referred as requested.

Mr. ALLISON. What was the amendment just agreed to?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Section 31 as amended.

Mr. ALLISON. That does not preclude other amendments?

Mr. COCKRELL. It was passed over until to-morrow.

Mr. ALLISON. I thought it was to go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair was not present when any such agreement was made.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Colorado, or, I believe, the Senator from New Jersey, asked that the amendment might go over until to-morrow to secure some additional information.

Mr. SEWELL. Yes; in order to get information from the Department, which I have sent for.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee desired it to go over?

Mr. ALLISON. That was my understanding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then it will go over.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask, then, what other amendments are pending?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no other committee amendment apparently. The Chair lays before the Senate an amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL], which will be read.

The SECRETARY. Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. SEWELL. On page 40, after line 11, insert:

That the President is hereby authorized to select from the retired list of the Army an officer not above the rank of brigadier-general who may have distinguished himself during the war with Spain, in command of a separate army, and to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the officer so selected to be major-general, United States Army, with the pay and allowances established by law for officers of that grade on the retired list.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] if he has offered his amendment?

Mr. DANIEL. I beg leave to state that my amendment is on the Clerk's desk. It was offered with the understanding that it would be brought up at the proper time, and I will call it up now.

Mr. SEWELL. I think that should be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was laying the amendments before the Senate in the order in which they were offered in the Senate, in order to prevent confusion.

Mr. DANIEL. I will offer my amendment, then, as an amendment to this amendment. I move to amend the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey by adding what will be read.

Mr. SEWELL. I intended to offer my amendment as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. DANIEL. I will then offer mine to come before the words the Senator has proposed. It will be the same in effect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia offers an amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey.

The SECRETARY. Insert, to precede the amendment offered by Mr. SEWELL, the following:

Any officer or enlisted man of volunteers——

Mr. DANIEL. That is a mistake, if you please. The Clerk is reading the wrong amendment. It was an amendment offered about three days ago, and it was printed.

Mr. SEWELL. I have a copy of the amendment here.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator kindly send it to the desk?

The SECRETARY. On page 40, after line 11, insert:

The President of the United States is hereby authorized to select from the brigadier-generals of volunteers two volunteer officers, without regard to age, and appoint them brigadier-generals, United States Army, for the purpose of placing them on the retired list.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to know what the purpose of the amendment is. Will the Senator explain it?

Mr. DANIEL. I beg leave to state that this amendment was offered on consultation with a number of members of this body with a view to giving an opportunity to the President of the United States to appoint General Wilson and Gen. Fitzhugh Lee brigadier-generals in the Regular Army.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. And to retire them?

Mr. DANIEL. And to retire them. They are the two persons the friends of the amendment have in view, but of course it leaves it in the power of the President to appoint any two he pleases.

Mr. PETTIGREW. What battles were these generals in?

Mr. DANIEL. The Senator can read the Spanish war history for himself. I am not here to give general information that is in the possession of everybody.

Mr. PETTIGREW. If I should read it, my question would not be answered.

Mr. DANIEL. I think that is the reason why the Senator asked it. It is obvious that he asked it on that account.

Mr. SEWELL. I will state that as far as one of these officers is concerned he was in the battles of the civil war and was one of the most distinguished cavalry officers we had. The other you all know, a man who bore his saber on the other side, but who did immense service to this country while serving in Cuba as a civil officer, and who was practically selected to command and lead the attack on Habana when it should come about. I do not know of anything more meritorious than the services of Fitzhugh Lee in connection with the Spanish war, and as far as General Wilson is concerned there was no finer soldier in the service.

Now, Mr. President, I move to amend by adding to the amendment of the Senator from Virginia the amendment offered by me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This was offered by the Senator from Virginia as an amendment to the one which was pending offered by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. SEWELL. I thought it was the reverse.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The language would have to be changed a little perhaps. This is the present one: "The President is hereby authorized," etc., and the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey is "that the President is hereby authorized." I suppose it should read "and the President is also hereby authorized."

Mr. SEWELL. Let it read "and the President is also hereby authorized."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL].

Mr. BATE. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be again read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The President of the United States is hereby authorized to select from the brigadier-generals of volunteers two volunteer officers, without regard to age, and appoint them brigadier-generals, United States Army, for the purpose of placing them on the retired list.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, as I can not find anything in the history of the Spanish war which shows that these generals were in any battle, and therefore can not secure an answer to my question in that way, I should like to make a still further inquiry. I should like to know why promotions can not be made without a special act of Congress?

Mr. DANIEL. I will explain that to the Senator. Both of these generals are above the age for appointment in the Regular Army. It is on account of age that a special act is asked.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Suppose they were within the age, could they still be appointed?

Mr. DANIEL. They could then be appointed brigadier-generals in the Regular Army.

Mr. PETTIGREW. And there is no statute which makes any difficulty in that direction? How is it with regard to promotions? I notice that whenever an effort is made to promote a soldier who has not been in any battle they come here; and Congress never promotes anyone except those who have not done any fighting. That has been the case during the Spanish war, at least. I think we have had three promotions by act of Congress of three men who were in no battle.

I suppose promotions can be had, if a man was in battle, for meritorious service, even over the heads of the others; but if that man has not been in any fighting I understand he can not under existing law be promoted over the heads of those who have served longer.

Mr. SEWELL. Will the Senator allow me to call his attention to the case of General Wheeler, a man who, utterly used up physically, got in an ambulance to go to the front at the battle of San Juan?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I was referring to promotions in the Regular Army.

Mr. SEWELL. He has been promoted. He was one of this class. Wheeler, Fitzhugh Lee, Wilson, and myself were appointed major-generals. I, unfortunately, did not go, for reasons known to the Senate, but the other three were the distinguished men on both sides, North and South, who were selected and who did go and who did do everything that it was possible for men to do under the circumstances.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, I had an opportunity to see one of these officers, General Lee, at the critical time just before the outbreak of the Spanish war. He was serving as consul-general in Habana, and in my opinion was in as much danger every day as he would have been in the ordinary battles of a war. He stood up manfully, a good, strong American, and I think he richly deserves, if he had not served at all, for his services there this promotion, for he is a true, good soldier. When he was in the service, I presume for good reasons he was not given the command over the city of Habana, where he had been, where he was well known and knew the people. Naturally he would have been disappointed, but he took service outside, and there was never one word of fault-finding on his part; but he took pride in his command and he bore the disappointment like a true soldier. I think he richly deserves this promotion.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I do not wish to be understood as throwing any slight whatever upon General Lee or General Wilson. I think they are excellent generals; but it does seem to me that these positions ought to go to the men who see service, and by that I mean who have won their right to the promotion by the danger they have run on the field of battle, and that the practice is a pernicious one for Congress to step in and interfere and place those who did not do the fighting over the heads of those who did.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to ask what is the difficulty that is to be met by the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey. Is it because there is no major-general who can be appointed?

Mr. SEWELL. I wish to say to the Senator from Colorado that the amendment introduced by me covers the case of the most deserving soldier we know of.

Mr. TELLER. I did not ask who it was; I thought I knew. But there is no vacancy.

Mr. SEWELL. He is the man who in a few days conquered the Spanish nation, the man who has even not had a brevet, the man who above all others in this country ought to be rewarded. They are all gallant people. The American soldier is gallant under any and all circumstances, and so is the sailor.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator does not understand my inquiry.

Mr. SEWELL. I beg pardon.

Mr. TELLER. I did not ask who it was; I thought I knew. What I wanted to know is the difficulty. Is there no vacancy he can be put in? That is what I mean.

Mr. SEWELL. He is retired now as a brigadier-general. I want to have him made a major-general on the retired list.

Mr. TELLER. He is retired already as a brigadier-general?

Mr. SEWELL. Yes; as a brigadier. He is a major-general of volunteers, to be mustered out on the 30th of June, but he is retired from the Regular Army.

Mr. TELLER. This proposition is to create a major-generalship and put him in it?

Mr. SEWELL. On the retired list.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] offers an amendment to follow the amendment of the Senator from Virginia, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

And the President is also authorized to select from the retired list of the Army an officer not above the rank of brigadier-general who may have distinguished himself during the war with Spain, in command of a separate army, and to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the officer so selected to be major-general, United States Army, with the pay and allowances established by law for officers of that grade on the retired list.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, which has just been read.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, as I understand it, this is for the purpose of promoting General Shafter, an officer of the Regular Army, and therefore the same reason can not be urged that was urged in favor of the other two officers. I suppose this is done because of the fact that he was in command at Santiago, and I am sure there is nothing I can find in the history of that contest which justifies Congress in making an exception in this case.

Therefore I am opposed to the amendment. I am opposed to this method of promoting people. We are quite liable to take people who have not done any fighting and promote them, or to promote people and give them credit for that fighting which was done by somebody else. This would be a case of the latter, because at Santiago the fighting was not done by Shafter. It was done by Wheeler. It was done by other officers in spite of Shafter, as I understand it. It seems to me to promote him over the other officers of the Army, and to have Congress do it, and confer special distinction for honor that was not won and service that was not rendered is a pernicious practice. It is a practice of favoritism, and it ought not to be adopted. No such further precedent should be established.

I am well aware it is not pleasant to urge these objections; but if I read the history of the Santiago campaign correctly, there is nothing in it that entitles General Shafter to promotion.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Will the Senator from South Dakota allow me a question?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Certainly.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Was not about the only action worthy of note in the campaign at Santiago the naval battle fought in the bay?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I have here an account of the battle of Santiago which, it seems to me, discloses to whose credit it is due, and it certainly is not to General Shafter. The battle fought by the Navy in the bay was a brilliant affair. The conduct of our troops at Santiago was as fine as the conduct of American troops always is, and the charge that they made is a brilliant one and sustains the reputation of the American soldier as unsurpassed by any other soldier in the world. But there is not one line that I can find which would give Shafter a particle of credit. It seems to me to be a bare matter of favoritism that this sort of thing is allowed and we permit this amendment to be adopted.

I ask the Secretary to read the most authentic history of the battle of Santiago extant.

Mr. GALLINGER. Who is the author of the book?

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator please state by whom it is written?

Mr. PETTIGREW. It is Senator LODGE'S account of the battle of Santiago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

But these reflections did not help matters at El Caney that July morning; and the feeble battery, the slow fire, and the target smoke soon disposed of the pleasant headquarters plan of taking the village in the course of an hour. There was nine hours' savage work ahead before the desired consummation could be reached. The Spaniards, although without artillery or siege guns, numbered about 800 men; were entirely protected and under cover in a stone fort, rifle pits, and strong blockhouses; knew perfectly and accurately all the ranges; could not retreat without rushing on destruction after our troops surrounded them—a sharp incentive to desperate resistance. So, while the slow artillery fire went on, the infantry began to suffer seriously from the deadly Spanish fire. They worked their way forward, creeping from point to point, but it was very slow and equally costly. At half past 1 the situation looked badly. The Americans were holding their own, but losing far more heavily than the Spaniards. An order from General Shafter at this moment to neglect El Caney and move to the assistance of the troops at San Juan must have seemed like a grim satire, and was disregarded.

But the evil hour had really passed. The artillery fire was quickened, and the fort began at last to go rapidly to pieces under the steady pounding. Colonel Miles's brigade joined General Ludlow in pressing the attack on the south; and then at last General Chaffee, whose men had been enduring the brunt of the fight, gave the order to storm, and the Twelfth Regiment sprang forward at the word, eager for the charge. Up the ravine they went to the east side, then swung to the right, broke through the wire fences, rushed upward to the top of the hill, and the fort was theirs. The enemy who had fought so stubbornly at rifle range could not stand the American rush; they had no desire to be taken "by the bare hands." The price paid had been heavy, but the dearly bought fort, in the words of an eyewitness, was "floored with dead Spaniards;" a grewsome sight. Yet, even as the wild cheers went up, it was seen that they were still exposed, and a heavy fire came from the blockhouses. Lining up in the fort the Americans poured volley after volley into these other strongholds, and the other brigades pressing home their charge the Spanish gave way, even retreat seeming less hopeless now than resistance, and fled from the village, dropping fast as they went under the shots of Ludlow's men. By 4 o'clock the firing had died away, and El Caney, at a cost which proper artillery would have greatly reduced, had been won by the unyielding, patient gallantry of the American regular infantry.

The Spaniards had less than a thousand men at El Caney, but they were under cover, strongly fortified, and knew the ranges. Shut in, desperate, and almost surrounded as they were, they appeared at their best, and fought with a stubborn courage and an indifference to danger which recall the defense of Saragossa and Gerona. Worthless as the Spanish soldiers have too often shown themselves to be, behind defenses and penned in by enemies, they have displayed a fortitude worthy of the days, three centuries ago, when the infantry of Spain was thought the finest in Europe. Of this tradition El Caney offered a fresh and brilliant illustration. The Spaniards lost nearly 500 men in killed, wounded, and prisoners, much more than half their number, and among the killed was the commander, General Vara del Rey, his brother, and two of his sons. On the American side the killed numbered 4 officers and 84 men; the wounded 24 officers and 332 men—the loss falling chiefly on Ludlow's and Chaffee's brigades, comprising the 4,000 men who were actively engaged throughout the day.

The force was composed entirely of regulars, with the exception of the Second Massachusetts Regiment, in Ludlow's brigade. These volunteers, never in action before, behaved extremely well, coming up steadily under fire and taking their place in the firing line. But the moment they opened with their archaic Springfields and black powder, which they owed to the narrow parsimony of Congress and to the lack of energy and efficiency in the system of the War Department, they became not only an easy mark for the Spanish Mausers, but made the position of more peril to all the other troops. In consequence of this they had to be withdrawn from the firing line, but not until they had suffered severely and displayed an excellent courage. The lack of artillery and the black powder made the assault on El Caney a work to which infantry should not have been forced. Yet they were forced to it, and supported by only four guns, but, splendidly led by Lawton, Chaffee, and Ludlow, they carried the position at heavy cost by sheer courage, discipline, and good fighting, manifesting these great qualities in a high degree, and one worthy of very lasting honor and remembrance.

Lawton and Chaffee and Ludlow had gone to El Caney with a well-defined purpose; but it is difficult, even after the most careful study and repeated reading of the official reports, to detect any plan whatever in the movements of the rest of the army. The troops had been moved up the narrow trail the night before, and at 7 in the morning Captain Grimes's battery opened from El Pozo Hill. Black powder again, and a magnificent target, so that the Cubans in the farmhouse, Rough Riders in the yard, and the First and Tenth Cavalry, all thoughtfully massed by some one in the immediate neighborhood of the battery, where they could be most easily hit, began to suffer severely. Then the two brigades of the cavalry division under General Sumner—the First, commanded by Colonel (now General) Wood, leading—moved down the road to Santiago. When the Rough Riders reached the ford of the San Juan they crossed and deployed in good order. Then a captive observation balloon was brought along and anchored at the ford where the troops were crossing and were massed in the road. As one reads the official statement of this fact comment and criticism alike fail. That such a thing should have been done seems incredible. The balloon simply served to give the Spaniards a perfect mark and draw all the rifle and artillery fire to the precise point where our men were densely crowded in a narrow road.

Fortunately the balloon was quickly destroyed by the enemy's fire; but it had given the place and the range, and there the troops remained for nearly an hour, exposed to heavy fire from the forts and blockhouse, and from guerrillas in trees, who here and elsewhere devoted themselves especially to picking off surgeons, wounded men, and Red Cross nurses. There the men stayed, dropping under the shots of the Spaniards, able to do nothing, waiting orders. No orders from headquarters came; the situation was intolerable; retreat meant not only defeat but useless and continual exposure to a slaughtering fire. No other resource remained except to take rifle in hand and, with infantry alone, carry strong intrenchments and blockhouses defended by well-covered regulars supported by artillery. Still no orders, and at last the division, brigade, and regimental commanders acted and ordered for themselves. Colonel Roosevelt led his Rough Riders forward from the woods, and asking the men of the Ninth to let him pass through, the regiment of regulars rose and followed him, and then the whole cavalry division went out and on up the first hill, where there was a red-roofed farm house, whence they drove the enemy.

A pause here, a taking breath, exposed all the time to a heavy fire from the strong main intrenchments now in plain view. Again Colonel Roosevelt calls on his men, starts, comes back because they had not heard, and off they go again over the long, open space, more than half a mile, which separates them from the Spanish post. The line of blue figures looks very thin and very sparse to those who are watching it. It seems to move very slowly. But it is moving all the time. Men stagger and drop, but the line goes on and up. It nears the top, the Spaniards break and run, and the cavalry division—six regiments—all mingled now, finds itself with the heights carried and the intrenchments on the right in its firm but tired grasp. With it has gone the Gatling battery under Captain Parker, who, in really splendid fashion, has kept his guns right at the front—a powerful ally and support in these trying moments. Colonel Roosevelt, who rode at first, has left his horse at a wire fence, and now finds himself the senior officer present and in command of all that is left of the six gallant regiments, having led dauntlessly and unhurt one of the most brilliant charges in our history.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from South Dakota if it is his intention to have this book printed as a document after having it read?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will yield to a motion to that effect by the Senator from Montana if he desires to make it.

Mr. SPOONER. Would not that violate the copyright? [Laughter.]

Mr. PETTIGREW. Of course, if the Senator from Montana wants it in that form, I have no objection at all. It is a very good book, I want to say. I should like to have the remainder of the chapter read. It is not much longer. I want to have read the comments of the Senator from Massachusetts on the battle, which come later.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). If there be no objection, the Secretary will continue the reading.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading, as follows:

Meantime over on the left the regular infantry are repeating against the fort of San Juan—the strongest of all the Spanish positions, and on a larger scale—the splendid work of the dismounted cavalry. This division, consisting of eight regiments of regulars and one of volunteers, was admirably commanded and led by General Kent. They moved up the road on the afternoon of June 30, and started again early on the next morning as soon as Captain Grimes's battery opened at El Pozo, with the First Brigade, under General Hawkins, in the lead. Their orders were to keep their right on the main road to Santiago. They, too, were held back by the crowd in the narrow trail, and still further delayed by waiting for the passage of the cavalry division, who were given the right of way. As they began at last to advance slowly they, too, came under the Spanish fire; they, too, received the punishment brought upon the army by the luckless balloon, and thus crowded together, at a halt almost, suffered severely.

The enemy's fire steadily increased; the shrapnel poured in where the balloon had marked the position, and the sharpshooters in the trees busied themselves, as they were doing already with the cavalry division. General Kent attempted to send the Seventy-first New York through a bypath, so as to bring them out in their proper position with the First Brigade, but when they came under the heavy fire of the enemy the first battalion broke, and were only held from a panic by the exertions of General Kent's staff officers. The other two battalions remained steady, for the regiment was of first-rate material, and the trouble arose from their being badly officered, and besides being endowed with a colonel who apparently did not come onto the field of action. In the end they rallied, and many went forward in the final charge with the regulars, notably the company under the gallant lead of Captain Rafferty. But at the moment the confusion in the New York regiment still further checked the already impeded advance. The First Brigade had gone on without the volunteers, and the Third Regiment was hurried forward by General Kent into the blocked road, and finally pushed through the New York regiment. As they came out and crossed the lower ford, Colonel Wikoff was killed, and two lieutenant-colonels who succeeded him in command of the brigade were quickly shot down—all in the course of ten minutes. Yet nothing could shake the nerve or break the discipline of this splendid brigade.

Following orders, making all the formations, operating in companies, battalions, and regiments, on they went through the heavy undergrowth, waist deep through the streams, and across barbed-wire defenses. Nothing could break them as they went steadily and fiercely onward. The Second Brigade finally, led by Colonel Pearson, was pushed through in the same way beneath a galling fire, out of a narrow trail and across the ford. Two regiments of Pearson's men went to the support of the Third Brigade, one to that of the First. Meantime the Third Brigade, connecting with the First on the right and sweeping round through a heavy fire, turned the enemy's right, and shared with the First in the assault. On they went up a steep hill 125 feet above the level, tangled with barbed wires, and crowned with deep trenches and the strong brick fort of San Juan. No artillery to help them. Regular infantry, rifle in hand, were going to take this high and heavily fortified position. Steadily and quickly they went at it, General Hawkins, a noble figure, white-haired, and with all the fire of youth in his gallant heart, leading a charge at the head of his two regiments. To those who watched it seemed to take a long time; but it was twenty minutes past 12 when the Third Brigade followed the First out of the death trap in the woods, and at half past 1 the steady, strong moving mass of infantry had cleared an outlying knoll, crossed the valley, scaled the rough, steep hill, and with Hawkins at their head and the men of the Third Brigade sweeping up on the left, stood triumphant on the crest, where they fell to intrenching themselves, and sent the Thirteenth Infantry off to support the cavalry division, while the Twenty-first Regiment pushed on 800 yards farther and took an advanced position. Altogether a very splendid feat of arms, very perfectly performed.

One other movement was made on July 1 on the extreme left. General Duffield was ordered to move along the railroad by the coast and make a demonstration at Aguadores, in order to keep the Spaniards engaged at that point and prevent their attacking our left. General Shafter especially ordered General Duffield not to sacrifice his men, but to "worry the enemy." When he reached the river at the point of crossing, he found that the bridge had been in part destroyed. The river also was deep and, according to General Duffield's estimate 600 to 700 feet wide. He therefore made no attempt to cross, but kept the enemy under fire until 3 o'clock, engaging them again the next day, and carrying out in this way his orders to the entire satisfaction of General Shafter, who recommended him for gallantry and good conduct at Aguadores. The total loss in their skirmishes, when the Thirty-third Michigan behaved very well, was 2 killed and 15 wounded.

The battle of San Juan, as it is called, consisted really of two detached attacks on the hill of that name and the separate action of El Caney. There were 6,464 officers and men at El Caney and 7,919 engaged at San Juan, apart from the small brigade (323 all told) of light artillery. There were among them 3 regiments of volunteers, but the Second Massachusetts, after suffering severely, had to be withdrawn from the firing line, on account of its black powder, and the Seventy-first New York was only partially engaged.

Deducting these two regiments, there were 12,507 officers and men engaged, including of volunteers only the Rough Riders, who, like the regulars, were armed with modern magazine rifles, and who showed themselves on that day the equal of any regulars in desperate fighting; but they numbered only 583 of the more than 12,000 men brought into action. The battle of San Juan, therefore, was preeminently the battle of the American regulars, of the flower of the American standing Army. With scarcely any artillery support, armed only with rifles, they were set to take heights and a village strongly held by regular soldiers and defended by forts, intrenchments, batteries, and a tangle of barbed-wire fences. This is something which the best military critics would declare well-nigh impossible and not to be attempted. The American Army did it. That is enough to say. They lost heavily, largely through the awkward manner in which they were crowded and delayed at the start. There were 21 officers and 220 men killed, and 93 officers and 1,280 men wounded, the percentage of the officers being remarkably high, except at Aguadores, where none were injured. On the Spanish side it is almost impossible to get any figures of the slightest value, even their official reports being filled with obvious falsehoods and contradictions.

General Wheeler gives the number at El Caney as 460; the official Spanish report puts it at 520, of whom only 80 returned unwounded. Capt. Arthur Lee, of the British army, who has written by far the best account of El Caney, says there were somewhat less than 1,000 Spaniards in the works and that at least half were killed and wounded. As his estimate of the losses agrees with the Spanish report, I have accepted it. The Spanish statement of their numbers at El Caney is so absurd, on their own report of losses, that Captain Lee's dispassionate estimate of the total force must also be accepted.

The case at San Juan is much more difficult. According to Lieut. Muller y Tejeiro, quoting what professes to be official reports, there were only 3,000 men defending Santiago, including the sailors, and only 250 men at San Juan Heights. This was so grotesquely false that it is easy to throw it aside, but it is not easy to reach the truth. Muller gives 520 men at El Caney and 250 at San Juan, and in one place gives the total killed and wounded as 593 and in another as 469, both manifestly absurd losses for 770 men. The Spaniards said at different times that they had as few as 1,400 and as many as 2,500 at Las Guasimas, which hardly coincides with the statement that there were only 3,000 men in the city.

Deducting Escario's force, which came in on July 2, there were 13,000 rifles, Mausers and Remingtons, surrendered in Santiago City when it capitulated, which indicates a total force of that number, unless we assume that each of Lieutenant Muller's 3,000 soldiers carried 4 rifles. As a matter of fact, the Spaniards had ultimately 12,000 to 13,000 men in Santiago; they had over 9,000 along the line of defenses on the east side confronting the Americans; and the works at San Juan were strongly held by at least 4,000 men, as stated by Mr. Ramsdem, the British consul, a thoroughly trustworthy witness. Their actual losses it is not easy to detect through the clouds of falsehood in the official reports; but as we know that they were heavier than the American at El Caney, and also at Las Guasimas, we may safely assume that the case was nearly the same at San Juan, although they had all the advantage of cover and position. It is certain that when the city surrendered they had more men in the hospital than the Americans. The Spaniards stood their ground bravely, fired heavily in volleys, and bore their punishment unflinchingly, but no where did they face the American rush and onset when they came close upon them. It was a hard fought battle, and both sides suffered severely, but the steady and irresistible American advance won.

After the victorious charge there was still no rest for the men who had climbed the steep sides of San Juan. Worn and weary as they were, they went to work to make intrenchments, and with scant food—Colonel Roosevelt's men feeding on what the Spaniards had left behind—they all toiled on through the night. At daylight the Spaniards attacked, opening a fire which continued all day. Yet, despite the fire and the drenching rain, the men worked on, and the new intrenchments, now frowning down toward the city, grew and lengthened. At 9 o'clock in the evening another attack by long-range firing was made by the Spaniards, and repulsed. The losses on the American side during this fighting on the 2d were not severe, as they were protected by breastworks, and the Spaniards were utterly unable to take the hill they could not hold from the men who had driven them from it when they had every advantage of position. Nevertheless, the situation was undoubtedly grave.

With 3,000 men only on the extreme ridge at first, we were confronted by 9,000 Spaniards. Our men were exhausted by battle, marching, and digging. They were badly fed. Transportation was slow and supplies scarce, and they were at first unsheltered. Under these conditions some officers thought about and urged withdrawal, while General Wheeler, backed strongly by many of the younger officers, and later by Lawton and Sumner, opposed any such movement. The spirit which carried the heights of San Juan held them; but to General Shafter, away from the front and the firing line, the voices of doubt and alarm came with effective force. During the day he fluctuated from doubt to confidence. He wanted Sampson to try at once and at all hazards to break in, and he proposed to General Wheeler to move against the entrance forts of the harbor, thus giving a tardy adhesion to the wise plan of Sampson and Miles, which he had abandoned.

Early on the morning of July 3 there came a dispatch from him, written under the first depressing influences, to the War Department, saying that he had Santiago well invested, but that our line was thin, the city strongly defended, and not to be taken without heavy loss; that he needed reenforcements, and was considering withdrawal to a position which an examination of the map showed to mean a retreat to the coast. This news—the first received in twenty-four hours—came upon those in authority at Washington with a depressing shock. General Shafter was urged to hold San Juan Heights, and in a confused hurry every effort was made to get together more transports—none having been brought back from Santiago—and to drive forward the departure of troops. It was the one really dark day of the war, and the long, hot hours of that memorable Sunday were heavy with doubt, apprehension, and anxiety.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I wish to make some comments upon the history of this battle.

It appears from this description that General Shafter refused to adopt the plans suggested by General Miles and Admiral Sampson to attack along the seacoast and have the support of our Navy in taking Santiago. He preferred to have the glory all to himself; and therefore he sent our troops into the interior without artillery, through thick brush, through narrow lanes, crowded together, to attack hills armed by batteries and men sheltered by intrenchments and covered with barbed wire fences. In other words, he did not send his artillery to clear the way; and the eminent historian says that hardly any commander of men would undertake such an experiment contrary to the lessons of history. Artillery should have been sent; but Shafter did not send it, and, according to this account, sacrificed the lives of many American soldiers because he did not send artillery and because the way was not cleared in advance by artillery.

Finally, when the hills were taken, Shafter wanted to retreat, and would have withdrawn if it had not been for the men at the front, who refused to withdraw. It will appear from this history that the only order Shafter made during the battle was disregarded. I read:

An order from General Shafter at this moment to neglect El Caney and move to the assistance of the troops at San Juan must have seemed like a grim satire, and was disregarded.

And that is the only order he made during the battle. He remained miles in the rear, in perfect safety, and gave one order, which would have been "a grim satire," and must have so seemed to the men in the front, who disregarded it, and who won the battle in spite of the commanding general. For this the commanding general is to be promoted by a special act of Congress over the men who actually did the fighting!

The lack of artillery and the black powder made the assault on El Caney a work to which infantry should not have been forced. Yet they were forced to it, and supported by only four guns; but, splendidly led by Lawton, Chaffee, and Ludlow, they carried the position at heavy cost by sheer courage, discipline, and good fighting, manifesting these great qualities in a high degree, and one worthy of very lasting honor and remembrance.

Lawton and Chaffee and Ludlow had gone to El Caney with a well-defined purpose, but it is difficult, even after the most careful study and repeated reading of the official reports, to detect any plan whatever in the movements of the rest of the Army.

And this is the man we propose to especially honor by a special act of Congress! Of course, if it is done, there ought to be some reason given to overcome this damaging testimony of the most eminent historian in this body.

There the men stayed, dropping under the shots of the Spaniards, able to do nothing, waiting orders. No orders from headquarters came; the situation was intolerable; retreat meant not only defeat, but useless and continual exposure to a slaughtering fire. No other resource remained except to take rifle in hand and, with infantry alone, carry strong intrenchments and blockhouses, defended by well-covered regulars supported by artillery. Still no orders, and at last the division, brigade, and regimental commanders acted and ordered for themselves.

And for this the man in command, Shafter, is to be especially selected for special honors by Congress itself! If this history is correct, his friends must certainly have been ignorant of it, or they would not have brought his name in here to have this record placed before the country.

The historian further says:

The American Army did it. That is enough to say. They lost heavily, largely through the awkward manner in which they were crowded and delayed at the start.

* * * * * * *

The spirit which carried the heights of San Juan held them, but to General Shafter, away from the front and the firing line, the voices of doubt and alarm came with effective force. During the day he fluctuated from doubt to confidence. He wanted Sampson to try at once and at all hazards to break in, and he proposed to General Wheeler to move against the entrance forts of the harbor, thus giving a tardy adhesion to the wise plan of Sampson and Miles which he had abandoned. Early on the morning of July 3 there came a dispatch from him, written under the first depressing influences, to the War Department, saying that he had Santiago well invested, but that our line was thin, the city strongly defended, and not to be taken without heavy loss; that he needed reenforcements, and was considering withdrawal to a position which an examination of the map showed to mean a retreat to the coast.

Shafter wanted to get under the guns of Sampson, where he could be safe and remain out of fire and out of range. He sent his men, without artillery, to take a hill by charging it. They had done all this, and held the hill, and yet Shafter wanted to retire so as to get under the guns of the fleet!

I remember well when the dispatch came, and I remember the feeling of the American people. It is fortunate that there was some one else at Santiago than Shafter. We had Lawton and Ludlow and Kent and Chaffee and Wheeler, who won the victory in spite of Shafter; and now it is proposed to especially promote Shafter for this blundering incapacity and inefficiency almost unparalleled in the history of a battle that was won.

It seems to me, unless these things can be answered and overcome, there is no reason, unless honors have become cheap and we have them to throw away, why we should select a man who so inefficiently sacrificed our troops on that occasion. It seems to me, if Congress has any honors especially to bestow, we had better stop bestowing them upon men who do not fight and give them to the men who do.

We have already promoted Corbin by act of Congress, though he remained in Washington during the whole war; and by act of Congress since the Spanish war commenced we have promoted Ainsworth, who kept the records and performed the duties of a clerk; and now it is proposed to put Shafter on the list, to emphasize the fact that Congress never promotes anyone by special act unless it is sure that he has not done any fighting.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Before the Senator takes his seat, I should like to ask him whether the book from which he has read was written by a gentleman on the ground—a man who knows. Is it not unfair to General Shafter to have this statement uncorroborated by official documents?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not think the Senator ought to make that observation.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The eminence of the author of the book is a sufficient answer to the question, and if there is any official record that contradicts its statements, the friends of Shafter had better bring it in. I have no doubt that the eminent historian who wrote this book thoroughly examined the records and took the testimony of innumerable people, and that the statements can be reasonably relied upon as accurate and correct.

Mr. TILLMAN. Has the whole record come out, however?

Mr. PETTIGREW. That I do not know. I should like to have the Senator, if he wishes more accurate information on this subject, address his questions to the author of the book.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator seems to know so much about it and is so fully informed that I thought he would give us some information as to the remainder of the disclosures that might be brought out.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Perhaps the Senator can inform me on the subject.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not feel warranted in doing that in the presence of the historian himself.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Perhaps, then, he had better ask the historian.

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President, it is unfortunate that the Senator from South Dakota never says anything good of anybody. He merely abuses everybody. His mind runs in that direction. I suppose he can not help it. Shafter was appointed in command of the Army, which consisted of about 18,000 men, selected as one of the best soldiers we had, the man who had settled up the whole of the Southwest. He had conquered the Comanche and all the surrounding Indians. He was the fighting man of the period from the civil war until the Spanish war, or until he had settled the Indian question in the territory which came under his control. I have known Ord to say, when in command of that department, that to Shafter was due the credit that was given him as commanding officer.

My admiration for Shafter is on account of the genius that he displayed in the Santiago campaign. Many of the men with whom I served during the civil war would have sat down at the landing at Guantanamo and other points and waited until the time when in that sickly country the men would have been used up; but he did not do this. He knew the danger of waiting. He knew that he could not even wait to build a road to get guns up. He knew the valor of his men. He even left the horses by the seashore. I consider that he is entitled to great credit.

The idea which he carried out, that he could fight better to-day than to-morrow or two weeks or a month from that time, gave us an early victory over the Spanish army and the Spanish nation, and to him is due the credit for the conception of that idea and for its execution.

The idea of keeping away from battle line! It is not a general's place to be on the battle line. It is to be at some convenient point where he can direct. There was never a question in his mind of retreat. It was advance, advance; go through the sand and everything else to strike the enemy, which he did. General Shafter made one of the greatest successes that we have in our history—the conquering, practically, of a great nation, with the help of the Navy afterwards, in a very short period of time, closing the war within a hundred days, and demonstrating to the Spanish infantry at Santiago that notwithstanding what they had, notwithstanding their defenses and their barbed wires, our men, with their usual gallantry, would carry something to cut the defenses and then rush on the enemy.

Mr. President, General Shafter has never asked for anything. By reason of the grumbles in the Navy about who should have reward, there has been nothing done in connection with the Army on account of the Santiago campaign. He has gone to his work without any promotion. He has faithfully served his country on the Pacific coast, and all the officers who were his lieutenants have had their reward in regular promotions to brigadier-generals; but General Shafter remains there to-day on duty, retired as a brigadier-general, entitled to what I ask for him and what the country owes him, and, I trust, will give to him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL].

Mr. TILLMAN. Let us have the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MONEY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCBRIDE]. I do not know how he would vote, and I therefore withhold my vote. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PENROSE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. KENNEY.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SPOONER (when the name of Mr. QUARLES was called). My colleague is paired, but I do not know with whom. I wish to say that he is detained from the Senate to-day by illness.

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CULBERSON (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. QUARLES]. He being absent, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. HEITFELD. I am paired with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. PLATT], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. HANNA (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS]. I desire to inquire whether he has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. HANNA. I have a general pair with him, and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. ELKINS. I am paired with the Senator from Texas [Mr. CHILTON]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 41, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—41.

Allen,	Foraker,	McCumber,	Shoup,
Allison,	Frye,	McEnery,	Simon,
Bacon,	Gallinger,	McMillan,	Spooner,

Cockrell,	Kenney,	Platt, N. Y.
Culberson,	Kyle,	Pritchard,

So the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. An amendment by Mr. PETTIGREW, to strike out all provisions in this bill which place an age limit against the appointment of meritorious volunteers to positions in the staff and line of the Regular Army, and add the following at end of bill:

It is further provided, That one-third of the original vacancies created by this act, in all grades, from colonel down to second lieutenant, in both staff and line, shall be filled by selection from the officers of volunteers who have been commissioned in their respective staff corps or arm of service since April 21, 1898. The remaining two-thirds of original vacancies created by this act to be filled by selection from the officers of the Regular Army.

Mr. PROCTOR. In the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, I move that the amendment be laid on the table.

Mr. DANIEL. There was so much noise in the Chamber that we could not hear what the amendment is. I ask that it may be again stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will again be stated.

The Secretary again stated the amendment.

Mr. DANIEL. May I inquire who offered the amendment?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I did.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW]. The Senator from Vermont moves to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. PETTIGREW. That is an unusual motion, I think—at least, until the author of the amendment has an opportunity to state his reasons for offering it. I hope, therefore, the Senator from Vermont will withdraw his motion to lay on the table, and thus allow me to discuss it before it is voted upon, rather than afterwards.

Mr. PROCTOR. Very well. We will hear from the Senator briefly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont withdraws his motion.

Mr. McCOMAS. I ask the Senator from South Dakota to yield to me to offer an amendment.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I yield.

Mr. McCOMAS. I desire to move, on page 21, line 7, to strike out all after the word "That" down to the end of line 10 and to insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 21, line 7, after the words "Provided, That," it is proposed to strike out:

All vacancies created or caused by this section shall be filled, as far as possible, by promotion according to seniority of officers of the Inspector-General's Department.

And in lieu thereof insert:

Promotions to vacancies above the grade of major created or caused by this act shall be made, according to the rules of seniority, from officers now holding commissions in the Inspector-General's Department. Vacancies created or caused by this act in the grade of major may be filled by appointment of officers who have held commissions as inspector-general of volunteers since April 21, 1898.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, the amendment which I offer provides:

That one-third of the original vacancies created by this act, in all grades, from colonel down to second lieutenant, in both staff and line, shall be filled by selection from officers of volunteers who have been commissioned in their respective staff corps or arm of service since April 21, 1898.

A little over one-third of the Army employed to-day are volunteers. This leaves all the places above colonel to be filled by those who are graduates of Westpoint, or from the Regular Army. It seems to me that it is no more than just and fair and right that one-third of the places from colonel down shall go to the men who have seen actual service in the field. Not only that, Mr. President, but this embraces the volunteers who served in the Spanish war, and not alone those who are now in the service and did not serve in the Spanish war, but have served in the Philippines, but that large number of men who served in Cuba and in the Philippines previous to the passage of the last Army bill. So the number of officers provided for is out of all proportion to the number of men from whom the selections are to be made, for under this provision two-thirds of the officers will come from the regulars, besides all of the positions above colonels of regiments.

Therefore it seems to me that it is no more than just and fair to the volunteer service that this amendment should be adopted. The provision which we have made is inadequate and unfair and unjust. If it is left to the Regular Army, of course the volunteers will receive as scant consideration as it is possible to bestow upon them. If it is left to examination, only those volunteers will get through who can answer the technical questions which will be propounded for the purpose of limiting their number to the smallest possible degree.

I ask to have the amendment which I have offered separated, and I offer first the latter part of it, which I will send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota modifies his amendment, and it will be stated as modified.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert the following additional proviso:

It is further provided, That one-third of the original vacancies created by this act, in all grades, from colonel down to second lieutenant, in both staff and line, shall be filled by selection from the officers of volunteers who have been commissioned in their respective staff corps or arm of service since April 21, 1898. The remaining two-thirds of original vacancies created by this act to be filled by selection from the officers of the Regular Army.

Mr. PROCTOR. This amendment would compel the President to appoint one-third of the officers in all the positions up to and including the grade of colonel from those who had served perhaps one or at most two years over officers of the Regular Army who have served thirty-five or forty years. I do not think the amendment is worthy of any consideration, and therefore I move to lay it on the table.

Mr. DANIEL. I rise to a point of order. I do not think it is in order to make a speech and then to move to lay the amendment on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is overruled. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Vermont, to lay on the table the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. PETTIGREW. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator from Virginia wish to address the Senate?

Mr. DANIEL. Yes, sir; I wish to speak on this subject.

Mr. PROCTOR. I did not so understand.

Mr. DANIEL. I want to make a few observations on the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. PROCTOR. On the amendment as divided—on the volunteer part of it?

Mr. DANIEL. I desire to make a remark or two on the amendment before the Senate.

Mr. PROCTOR. Very well, then; I will oblige the Senator.

Mr. DANIEL. We can seek an opportunity hereafter, if it is inconvenient now.

Mr. PROCTOR. I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont withdraws his motion.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I am in favor of the amendment which has just been offered or some amendment of like nature. I do not think the Senate ought to engage in so strenuous an effort to deny to the citizen soldiery of this country, who came to the front to serve it in time of war, an opportunity to hold such offices as they may be fitted by experience and talent to hold, confirmed by the judgment of the President and of the Senate. I am a believer, Mr. President, in the freest kind of free institutions, and I believe that the Constitution of the United States has left this matter exactly where Congress would be wise to leave it also. It does not follow that because an officer has served as a volunteer the President will see fit to appoint him. Neither does it follow as matter of course that should the President make an inadvisable appointment the Senate would confirm it. But I consider that it is the right of every free citizen of this country to fight for his country, and I do not think that anything ought to be done by law to abridge the exercise of that right in such place and in such manner as his character, intelligence, service, and patriotism may befit.

The view which the committee seems to take of the volunteers now is very different from that which Congress took of the volunteers after the civil war. I can appreciate that there is some difference, because the last war was nothing like so severe a one, but it seems to me that the Military Committee has gone too far in fixing it so that no volunteer, however distinguished, however fitted, however appropriate his selection may be, shall receive a commission in the Regular Army higher than that of first lieutenant.

I have before me Public Act No. 181, approved July 20, 1866. It is entitled "An act to increase and fix the military peace establishment of the United States." In that act there is a provision that the military peace establishment shall consist of 5 regiments of artillery, 10 regiments of cavalry, 45 regiments of infantry, and the professors and cadets at Westpoint, and so on. Now, as to the 4 regiments of cavalry to be added to the 6 then existing, to make the 10, it is provided:

The original vacancies in the grades of first and second lieutenants shall be filled by selection from among the officers and soldiers of volunteer cavalry, and two-thirds of the original vacancies in each of the grades above that of first lieutenant shall be filled by selection from among the officers of volunteer cavalry, and one-third from officers of the Regular Army, all of whom shall have served two years in the field during the war and have been distinguished for capacity and good conduct.

In reference to the infantry it was provided:

And all the original vacancies in the grades of first and second lieutenant shall be filled by selection from among the officers and soldiers of volunteers, and one-half the original vacancies in each of the grades above that of first lieutenant shall be filled by selection from among the officers of volunteers, and the remainder from officers of the Regular Army, all of whom shall have served two years during the war, and have been distinguished for capacity and good conduct in the field.

Respecting the Quartermaster's Department, it was provided:

And the vacancies hereby created in the grade of assistant quartermaster shall be filled by selection from among the persons who have rendered meritorious service as assistant quartermasters of volunteers during two years of the war.

So, Mr. President, it will be observed from this act, which was the organic act of the Regular Army in 1866, that Congress took particular pains to open the Regular Army to the entrance of meritorious volunteers who had served for two years. There were a great many more volunteers in the late war than there were regulars. There were over 200,000 volunteers. There were many more than had opportunity to distinguish themselves in battle.

But the present volunteer force of the United States, some 30,000 strong, has every enlisted man of it in the Philippine Islands to-day in the presence of the enemy. They have fought in those islands in over a thousand battles and skirmishes, the names of which are mentioned in the report of the Adjutant-General. There are many officers belonging to the Regular Army, which has 38,000 men in the Philippines, who are here in the United States, and there are some volunteer officers in the United States; but there are no volunteer enlisted men—not a company, not a squad—here in the United States. The whole volunteer service of this country to-day that we are engaged in fencing off from the honors of war are absent 7,000 miles from home in the presence of the enemy, and their representatives are engaged, while they are in the face of the enemy, in legislating to deny to them the fitting honors of war——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. DANIEL. And so to proscribe them in this military bill that although this body may consider and although the President of the United States may consider that they are the fittest men to command companies and battalions, to see to it that not one of these shall get such a commission.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. DANIEL. I will yield for a question.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am not very familiar with this bill and especially not familiar with military matters. I wanted to ask the Senator from Virginia if I correctly understood him to say that no man now in the volunteer service, whatever his rank, can be appointed under this bill in the Regular Army at a higher rank than first lieutenant.

Mr. DANIEL. I so understand it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Whatever his rank may be, if he is a general——

Mr. DANIEL. He may be a general, colonel, major, captain, or what not, it is proscriptive against the whole volunteer force of the United States, denying to the President and to the Senate the right to give them any commission whatever above that of first lieutenant.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator further, does the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota reach this point and cure this apparent defect?

Mr. DANIEL. To a degree. It prescribes that one-third of the commissions shall be given to the volunteers. I doubt if that is the best way to get at it.

Mr. BATE. Then, as I understand it, if the Senator from Virginia will allow me, the bill provided for second lieutenants only until it was amended the other day to meet the difficulty.

Mr. DANIEL. I will call attention to the fact just here that the public documents on this subject do not indicate, at least with such perusal as I have been able to give them, the origin and authorship of these proscriptive disfranchising measures.

It is said in one of the reports—I can not turn to it at this moment—that care has been taken to provide for the volunteers. What was meant by care in that expression was that the rear end of the Army, the lowest rank, had been opened for the possibility of their entering into it in the rank of second lieutenant. I have the report before me now. It is on page 2. It reads:

> Care has been taken to give deserving officers of volunteers who are to be mustered out an opportunity for entering the Regular Army.

That care, Mr. President, consists in this case in authorizing, under certain restrictions and conditions and after giving a great many preferences, their examination for the office of second lieutenant. The Secretary of War, the President of the United States, have not seen fit to recommend to Congress this disfranchisement of our volunteer forces who are out of the country engaged in its defense, and who have no men here to look after their interests and to beset members of Congress with their proposals of plans for organizing the Army of the United States.

Neither has the committee in its report given indication of any other sentiments toward the volunteers save of the great care that they feel for giving deserving officers or volunteers an opportunity of being mustered into the Regular Army of the United States.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. DANIEL. But we find, Mr. President——

Mr. HAWLEY. I beg pardon; I should like to have a little matter of business transacted which would be for the convenience of the Senate, I am sure. The copies of the pending bill are so marred with amendments made and printing that it is vexatious to try to find anything. I ask an order to print it to-night for to-morrow morning, as far as possible, with all the amendments given to date.

Mr. DANIEL. I am very glad that the chairman of the Military Committee has asked that the bill may be printed for use to-morrow after such amendments as have been adopted by the Senate have been ingrafted upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate consent to the order? Without objection, the order is made. The Senator from Virginia will proceed.

Mr. DANIEL. I will discontinue my remarks, Mr. President, until we get a printed copy of the bill, with just one suggestion about it.

It seems to me that when a large force of volunteers has responded to the call of Congress and entered upon a task which is dangerous and far away from home, every member of the body to whose call they have so patriotically responded should feel in their absence that he should scrutinize the bill and see that it does them no injustice.

I do not desire, Mr. President, to press consideration for the volunteer soldier beyond a due regard to the regular soldier, for both are entitled to high consideration, and in commending the one I would not disparage the other. But it is true, Mr. President, that if ever this country gets into war of any magnitude it is the volunteer we have got to rely upon to defend it. The very moment that the war, which is now over with Spain, broke out, the President and the Congress and the people at once turned to the volunteer.

It was said correctly a few days ago by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] that we are not out of sight of war. He might have added that we are not only in sight of war, but we are in war, and he might also have reflected that whether that be a war which is recognized according to international law as between nations or a de facto nation on one side and a recognized nation on the other, it is a war which has to-day in the field in the Philippine Islands 68,000 men, and nearly one-half of them are volunteers. I will present the statistics to-morrow upon this subject, and they will show that the volunteers have fought in the Philippine Islands more battles than the regulars have and have suffered greater casualties in blood. While I would not exalt them beyond their due and equitable share of military honor, surely the men who have gone upon the field together and spilt their blood in the same channel ought not either of them to try to exclude the other from the just and proper recognition by their countrymen of their merits.

I hope to-morrow, Mr. President, before this bill shall go to the other House for concurrence, that the Senate will turn its attention to the just and proper recognition of the volunteer. If you make the bill restrictive on one side by requiring that so many positions shall be given to the regulars, it will then be necessary for those who wish to see justice done to the volunteer to seek for some corresponding restriction upon the other side, such as that proposed by the Senator from South Dakota; but it would be better, in my judgment, to trust the President of the United States and the Senate of the United States, which are the constitutional officials of a free country, to judge of the fitness of men to hold office and to select them for that office without too many restrictions put upon the places to be filled by law.

I believe you injure the service of the country and injure the growth of free ideas whenever you put incumbrances and restrictions around official position. The men who have the right to select these officers are not going to select improper persons simply because their choice is unrestricted by law. They will then more keenly feel that the responsibility of selecting the right man is upon them; that responsibility will be daily impressed upon their minds by the exercise of it and by the pursuit of the inquiries necessary to proper selections. Wherever a law attempts to define and describe a certain particular few, it relieves the Executive and the Senate of their responsibility for the selection, and the whole official coterie of the country is consolidated together under partial and discriminating laws. Instead of such a condition we should leave a fair field and open competition to the great body of the people, which is the very genius of true republicanism and true democracy.

PREFERENCE TO VETERANS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The junior Senator from Maine asks for the present consideration of an order which will be read to the Senate.

The order was read and agreed to, as follows:

> Ordered, That the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of all petitions praying the passage of H. R. 5779 (the veteran preference measure) and that they be referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. H. L. OVERSTREET, one of its clerks, announced to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. FRANK G. CLARKE, late a Representative from the State of New Hampshire, and transmitted resolutions of the House thereon.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had appointed Mr. SULLOWAY, Mr. HILL, Mr. KNOX, Mr. CAPRON, Mr. HOWELL, Mr. LANE, Mr. ALLEN of Maine, Mr. LANDIS, Mr. LITTLEFIELD, Mr. WEAVER, Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts, Mr. GRIGGS, Mr. GAINES, Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana, Mr. NAPHEN, and Mr. KING members of the committee on the part of the House to attend the funeral of the late Hon. FRANK G. CLARKE.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution:

A bill (H. R. 1734) granting a pension to Mary A. Whitmore;

A bill (H. R. 2752) granting an increase of pension to Edmund P. Tierney;

A bill (H. R. 5117) granting a pension to Roland Burnett;

A bill (H. R. 5655) granting a pension to Lurinda Laughlin;

A bill (H. R. 9108) granting a pension to Maria H. Hixson;

A bill (H. R. 10062) granting an increase of pension to Harriet Crotsenburg;

A bill (H. R. 10785) granting a pension to Thomas White;

A bill (H. R. 13394) providing for the payment of electoral messengers; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 144) to fill a vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE CLARKE, OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask that the resolutions just received from the House be laid before the Senate.

The President pro tempore laid before the Senate the following resolutions from the House of Representatives; which were read:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, January 10, 1901.

Resolved, That the House has heard with deep regret and profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. FRANK G. CLARKE, late a Representative from the State of New Hampshire.

Resolved, That a committee of 16 members of the House, with such members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral at Peterboro, N. H., and that the necessary expenses attending the execution of this order be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for properly carrying out the provisions of this resolution.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate, and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I submit the resolutions I send to the desk, for which I ask present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of Hon. FRANK G. CLARKE, late a Representative from the State of New Hampshire.

Resolved, That a committee of six Senators be appointed by the presiding officer to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to take order for superintending the funeral of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask for the adoption of the resolutions.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed as the committee on the part of the Senate, under the second resolution, Mr. CHANDLER, Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. DEBOE, Mr. SCOTT, Mr. MCLAURIN, and Mr. HEITFELD.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, January 11, 1901, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 10, 1901.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer was offered by the Rev. JOHN COLEMAN ADAMS, D. D., of New York City, as follows:

Let us pray, Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, before the beginning of this day's work, to ask Thy blessing and Thy gracious favor upon these Thy servants assembled here. Guide and direct them, we beseech Thee, in all that they shall do. Help them to be ever mindful of their responsibility unto Thee, whose throne is the highest of all tribunals, and their obligation unto that law of the Lord which is the chief and supreme code. Lead them, we pray Thee, in all they shall do here that nothing may be done to hinder, but all things to help, that blessed day when the kingdoms of this earth shall be the kingdoms of the Lord.

We remember tenderly, O Thou Almighty God, that the shadow of death has swept this Chamber, and that one has been called from his labors here to enter upon the tasks of the invisible God. Cherish and comfort, we beseech Thee, the family and friends of him who hath gone, and give us all a sense of how brief our time is, and help us to work while it is day, for the night cometh when no man can work. And these things we ask and beseech for Thy name's sake, in the spirit of the blessed Master, Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CODIFICATION OF POSTAL LAWS.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent that after the conclusion of the river and harbor bill House bill 13423 be made the special order. I will say to the House that it is a bill to revise and codify the postal laws. It contains no change of law, but simply incorporates into statute the changes that have taken place since 1873 and repeals such statutes as have become obsolete.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Is it recommended by the committee?

Mr. LOUD. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that House bill 13423, a bill to revise the postal laws of the United States, may be made the special order after the disposition of the river and harbor bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I want to ask the gentleman from California if this is the unanimous recommendation of the committee?

Mr. LOUD. I will state, Mr. Speaker, that it is the unanimous recommendation of the committee. The criminal laws are such as were revised by the Commission to Revise and Codify the Laws, of which our late member, Judge Culberson, was a member. This bill has been carefully gone over by Judge BURKE, of Texas, the Assistant Attorney-General, and Representative MCPHERSON, of Iowa.

Mr. MCRAE. This is a codification bill, and not to authorize the codification?

Mr. LOUD. It is a codification.

Mr. MCRAE. It calls for no change of postal rates in any class of matter?

Mr. LOUD. None whatever.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, to-morrow being Friday, is it pension day under the rule?

Mr. LOUD. I will say, Mr. Speaker, that I will incorporate into my request that it shall not interfere with pension day.

Mr. GIBSON. Then I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE SENATOR CUSHMAN K. DAVIS.

Mr. EDDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Saturday, February 2, 1901, at 3 o'clock p. m., be assigned for the consideration of resolutions of respect to the memory of the late CUSHMAN K. DAVIS, a distinguished member of the United States Senate from the State of Minnesota.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was agreed to.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE RICHARD A. WISE.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, some time since I gave notice that I would ask the House to fix a day when those who desired to do so might present eulogies on my late colleague, RICHARD A. WISE, of Virginia. I now ask unanimous consent that Saturday, February 9, at 4 o'clock, shall be set aside for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that Saturday, February 9, at 4 o'clock p. m., be set apart for eulogies upon the life and character of the late Representative RICHARD A. WISE. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE SENATOR JOHN H. GEAR.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Saturday, January 26, at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, be set aside to pay tributes of respect to the late Senator JOHN H. GEAR, from the State of Iowa.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that Saturday, January 26, at 4 o'clock p. m., be set aside for tributes of respect to the late Senator GEAR, of Iowa. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE JOHN H. HOFFECKER.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I move that February the 16th, at 4 o'clock p. m., be set aside for eulogies and tributes of respect to the late JOHN H. HOFFECKER, a member of this House from the State of Delaware.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that February 16, at 4 o'clock, p. m., be set apart for eulogies on the late JOHN H. HOFFECKER, from the State of Delaware. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. BURTON. Before making the motion that the House go into the Committee of the Whole on the river and harbor bill, I desire to ascertain whether we can agree upon any limitation of general debate. I ask unanimous consent that general debate terminate at 3 o'clock to-day.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I object.

Mr. BURTON. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of House bill 13189—the river and harbor bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. HOPKINS in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13189) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] for five minutes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask the Clerk to read for information an amendment which at the proper time I desire to offer to this bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out in line 18, page 75, the word "three" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "six."

[Mr. SHACKLEFORD addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for twenty-five minutes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I do not crave the pleasure of disturbing the harmony that seemed to exist yesterday in the matter of the irrigation of arid lands, and yet I feel the duty pressing upon me to make known a few suggestions that may be of ultimate value, or may not, as the predisposition of Congressmen now appear. I recognize the mighty importance of the subject. I recognize in the fullest extent how grand is the picture of 600,000,000 acres of land, now practically a barren waste, and which it appears can be made available for homes and for the development of the country and the disposition of the crowded overflow of population which we anticipate in the future. I have no doubt that the coming Congresses of the United States will take hold of this question, for it is quite apparent that the organization in favor of some action of a national character is complete and perfect, and yet I fear that it will be my duty hereafter, as well as now, to make suggestions that will not be promotive of the possibility of national action in this behalf.

I wish to discuss the question very briefly from two standpoints. One, the question of legality, and about that I shall say but very few words; the other the question of propriety, or expediency, or justice, as you may divide up the question. Under what power of this Government is this measure sought to be promoted? What jurisdiction has the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to consider, report, and act upon a proposition looking to the fertilization of waste farming lands, lands available for farming purposes, but by reason of their character originally or by reason of something which has occurred since, more latterly, they are no longer fit for agricultural purposes. What is the power of Congress, and from whence derived, to appropriate money looking to the fertilization of those lands? I deny that there is any power and deny that it is any part of the province of the Federal Government to in any way, by any system whatever, either by direct appropriation, under the right name, or by other device that reaches the same results by a different route or travel, I deny that Congress has any such power.

I will not quote the language of our Democratic brethren upon cognate questions; but we all understand that the fathers of the Constitution, and the great statesmen that followed its adoption, not only condemned by their utterances action of this character, but they denied the power of Congress to legislate for the improvement of rivers and harbors, and over and over again the Democratic platforms of the country, under the inspiration of the very men who grew up with the development of the Constitution, denied the power of Congress to dredge a river or a harbor of the country. Since I have been a member of this House, and while a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, over and over again aged Democrats, Democrats of great experience, Democrats of wisdom, when they came before the committee for their States always reiterated—I have in my mind one of them, and I am looking at my friend from Mississippi, who has heard it—always reiterated his latent denunciation of the proposition that Congress had any right to legislate for the improvement of rivers and harbors, and always said that in the interest of his constituents he would waive his constitutional objection.

Mr. CLARK. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLARK. Do you not know that so great a logician as Calhoun admitted the constitutional right of Congress to improve the great waterways?

Mr. GROSVENOR. At what date?

Mr. CLARK. It does not matter what date. Did not he do it?

Mr. GROSVENOR. If my friend will allow me, I will share his information with mine.

Mr. CLARK. And I want to ask you another question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Wait until I answer this. Some time about 1845 Mr. Calhoun was converted. He was converted on a great many other questions, too.

Mr. CLARK. Suppose he was?

Mr. GROSVENOR. But he was especially converted to the doctrine that Congress has the power to improve rivers and harbors; and I will tell you when it came, how it came, and why it came. He was a protectionist, a high-tariff man. He was converted when the magnificent interest in Southern cotton grew up, and when there grew to be a necessity for deep water and better harbors; and that corrected the erroneous ideas of the distinguished gentleman to whom my friend has referred.

Mr. CLARK. Well, let me ask you another thing. Is there not a good deal of difference in argument against a thing as an original proposition, and then, when it has become the settled policy of the Government to do that thing, to accept the theory?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think that is quite a fair statement.

Mr. CLARK. Now, another thing. Did not Calhoun and Webster just simply swap places on the tariff question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, there has been a good deal of swapping, until it would seem that there is nothing left to swap.

Mr. CLARK. Do you read the Philadelphia North American Review?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Sometimes.

Mr. CLARK. It is advocating cutting down the tariff on account of the extortions of the plate-glass trust.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I was going to say, and insist upon it, that we have just come out of a mighty Presidential campaign, when great men have appeared before the public; and while I did not hear every speech made, nor did I read every one of the editorials written, I did not hear, nor do I hear, of any man making any speech on free trade or against the present protective tariff.

Mr. CLARK. That simply grew out of the fact that there was a multiplicity of other issues.

Mr. GROSVENOR. You have had your chance. I therefore consider that question foreclosed; and when the gentlemen who are to perform the reorganization of the Democratic party, if they have any consistency, when the next pronunciamento shall be issued the Democratic platform will contain a high-protection proposition and the assertion that the party has always been in favor of it. [Laughter.] After a while it came to be admitted, or, in other words, the Democratic party ceased to oppose appropriations for rivers and harbors, and having been so long out of the business they became about as vigorous advocates of appropriations as anybody I have ever met in Congress. [Laughter.]

Upon what ground is that? Upon the ground that Congress has the right to legislate for the navigation of the waters of the country in the interest of commerce, the great subject that is placed exclusively in the hands of Congress, the right to control commerce both among the States and with foreign nations, and the right to do all the incidental things that relate to the movement of the products of the land. But when you get to fertilizing real estate you have got beyond the dream of the most optimistic constructionist of the Constitution when he casts his eye over the sentence "to promote the general welfare."

Why, Mr. Chairman, what is the difference in legal principle between the proposition to irrigate the arid lands of the West and another proposition which would be of the highest value, a proposition to fertilize the lands of abandoned farms in some of the Eastern States?

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. KING. Does not my friend see a wide distinction between the fertilization of private land and the Government taking care of and rendering more profitable and valuable its own land?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think not; when the land is intended, as it is now, for the occupation of actual settlers, or for sale under the public-land act of this country exclusively for settlers, I can see no distinction. I deny that the Government of the United States has any power to tax me in order to enhance the value of the public domain of the country. I meet the gentleman's question fairly. Now, I have gone far enough upon the question of law. I do not believe, I do not yield the point, I deny the power of Congress by a much stronger reason, the duty of Congress.

Now let me go very briefly to another side of the question. It is unjust, and will not become the policy of the American people. We have gone far enough in legislation for special interests in the United States.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. Will the gentleman permit a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. What is the difference, in the gentleman's opinion, between appropriating money to irrigate arid lands and granting bounties in the way of subsidies to shipbuilding companies?

Mr. GROSVENOR. As wide as the difference between the levying of a tariff and the supplying of agricultural implements. I do not know anybody that disputes the legal right of the Government to subsidize the ships of this country in the foreign or domestic trade. We have always, from 1789, subsidized the American ships in the coastwise trade of the United States. We are doing it to-day. We do it by protecting them from foreign competition.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. The gentleman said a moment ago that he objected to being taxed to improve the public domain. Is he willing to be taxed to enrich a private monopoly?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am not, and nobody else is. There is not any such thing in the shipping business in the world as a private monopoly. While the timber grows, while the iron is produced, while labor exists, and money is in the country, and the ocean spreads itself out, there will never be a monopoly in the shipbuilding business. There never can be a monopoly, and the gentleman must not possess himself of such a doctrine as that. The ocean and the interest of the carrying trade is duplicated in principle by the right of the Government to build and construct the Pacific Railroad, as was done in the time of the rebellion, when we subsidized the Pacific Railroad line, one first and then others later, in order that we might connect the various parts of our system by iron and steel bands with the Pacific coast and give us access to the Pacific Ocean. But I am not going to be led aside to discuss the subsidy question now. I will meet my friend in due time, ready for any fray he may engage in.

Now, then, let us see how this stands. Here are these great agricultural interests in this country. They extend from the Atlantic to the Pacific. There are abandoned lands. There are the worn-out lands of some of the Eastern States. There are rich and fertile lands in a number of the States. Then you pass over the Missouri River, across a great belt of magnificent land and come to these arid lands. All these lands are the foundation upon which is built the agricultural system of the country. Land in the State of Ohio, much of it, is worth $100, $125, to $150 an acre for agricultural purposes. It brings $10, $15, to $20 per acre net rental, ex taxes. That lower rate is often paid in the county where I live per acre for land for purely agricultural purposes. What makes it thus valuable? In one respect its quality, and in another respect its location. It is nearer the world's markets, it is nearer the great markets of the country, and another thing is its great value inherent in the soil itself.

Mr. BROWN. And it is located in Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; that is one thing that helps it very much. But go farther into the Wabash country, into the White River country, go everywhere into the Middle West and into that great country we call the Northwest, and the soil is magnificent and the facilities for agriculture are not surpassed in the world. Now, we are paying taxes, we are upholding our State governments, our municipal governments, our educational systems, and incidentally we are paying our taxes for the upholding of the Federal Government and putting the money into the Treasury that it is proposed now shall be used for—what? For the fertilization of the lands of the West and Northwest. I deny the propriety of it from the standpoint of equal, exact justice to all the people of the country.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. KING. As I remember, in the platform of the party to which my distinguished friend belongs there is a declaration in favor of the reclamation of the arid lands of the West.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is all right, if it is so.

Mr. KING. How does my friend suppose that reclamation can be effected unless the parent Government makes appropriations for the purposes indicated?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Several times in the course of my brief career on this floor I have had occasion to say that some of these ornamental propositions in the national platform have never been approved by me, because I did not know that they were there. I always take the platform as representing two or three great things, and the declarations I pay but very little attention to; but there is this distinction: We own the land, and one of the things which are the duty of the General Government is to survey it, and while my friend the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY], chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, doubtless has all the precedents right at his tongue's end, I do not know how much beyond that in the way of fertilization the Government has ever gone in the matter of these lands. But I do know that the principle upon which you would take the money of my constituent and pay it out for the building up of any competitive power against my constituent is not just legislation.

That is what I have to say, and that the farmer of the Scioto Valley, the farmer of the Hocking Valley, the farmer of the Miami Valley, and the farmer of the lateral streams crossing the country away west of there shall not be put in the position of paying taxes for the purpose of benefiting the landowner of the Northwest, and, secondly, indirectly obliterating the advantage which God has given him in the location of his farm. Every new tillable and rich farm becomes a competitor of every other; and while I shall glory in seeing these arid lands coming into use, and shall rejoice in the growth of a population thrifty and happy, as much as any man can, I deny that any system ought to be inaugurated by which the money of the East shall be taken to build up competition against their best interests by improving the arid lands of the West.

I am willing to vote for all the experiments that will give information to the people of the country and the world about these public lands. I am willing to do anything that will bring these lands into the market and under the notice of the teeming thousands that I hope will go there; but I am unwilling that this system of fertilization shall be carried on until the arid lands of New Hampshire and of Maine (which is now apparently becoming a keystone or pivotal State of the Union) shall also have the benefit of phosphorescent improvement of their agricultural lands. What is the difference? My friend from Utah suggests that the difference is in the fact that the farmer of Maine owns his land, while these lands which are sought to be reclaimed are Government lands. Now, very well. Has the Government, therefore, a right to improve its lands in soil by taxing the land that is already held by the citizens of the country? I deny it. Let us develop these lands as far along the line as possible. We have experimental stations in the agricultural States of the country, and we devote our money sometimes to experiments that the Government can make and which private individuals can not make.

Now, apropos of that and in consonance with that, I would be willing to see a test made; I would be willing to see a great reservoir upon some tract of arid land completed and experimented with for the purpose of pointing out to the people who might come and settle upon those lands the possibility of what might be done. And I would gladly and cheerfully vote to turn over those lands to any State that desires them; but I am unwilling that without protest a great scheme shall be put in motion here to-day looking too the enormous expenditures that must come when, in my judgment, it is first unconstitutional and illegal, and second, unjust and unfair to the whole mass of the people of the country.

Mr. HEPBURN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Iowa that he will first recognize the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JONES], and then will recognize the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Chairman, at the proper stage in the proceedings on this bill I propose to offer an amendment for the improvement of Grays Harbor and Chehalis River, and I propose briefly to explain the reasons why I intend to offer this amendment. I think it is an improvement in which every member of this House is interested, for this reason: This House has heretofore provided for the improvement of the bar entrance to this harbor at an expenditure of a million dollars, and unless this project is carried out and completed the benefits that the Government was to derive from that improvement will be very largely lost.

Hence, it seems to me that this is a matter in which every member of this House is interested. I think also that this is a proposition which, while I called it to their attention, did not receive the consideration at the hands of the committee that they probably would have given it had they fully understood the situation. I understand how it is, with the great number of claims and demands made upon the committee that they might have overlooked it somewhat. So I desire especially the attention of the members of this committee to this proposition.

Now, there are three improvements which are similar in name. One is called the improvement of Grays Harbor and the bar entrance. This is the construction of the jetty at the entrance to the ocean. The other is the improvement of Grays Harbor and Chehalis River. This is the one for which I desire an appropriation and covers the natural harbor as far as large vessels ascend. The third is the improvement of Chehalis River. This is the improvement of the river itself. In name they are very similar, but the improvements are entirely different. A description of each project is found in Report of Engineers of 1896, pages 3333 to 3344.

Grays Harbor is about 17 miles long. At the entrance of the harbor there is a great work being conducted by the Government now, which was authorized by the act, I think, of 1896, at a total cost of $1,000,000. They are putting in a jetty in order to confine the waters and increase the depth of the channel connecting it with the ocean. The results have been more than the engineers and officers of the Government expected. In the report of the engineers for 1900 the statement is made that the depth of this channel has been increased from 14 to 18 feet, or an increase of 4 feet in the last two years. The depth expected is from 20 to 24 feet. The Grays Harbor and Chehalis River improvement that I have mentioned is an improvement within the harbor, several miles above the bar entrance. Coming up from the ocean the first city that we strike is the city of Hoquiam. Below that, between the city and the bar entrance, there is a shoal which at low water has only a depth of 8 to 12 feet.

Now, vessels coming in through the bar entrance, where we expect to get a depth of 20 feet, can not pass that shoal unless some improvement is made without waiting from day to day on the tides. In other words, unless this amendment is made the improvement at the bar entrance is almost useless. A million-dollar improvement there that the Government has made will be almost useless. Hoquiam is the first town to be reached. Then above Hoquiam we get to Aberdeen, the largest town on the harbor, and between these two cities there is another shoal where the depth of the water is only about 7 feet and vessels have to wait from day to day on tides in order to get out to sea. So you can see unless these two shoals are made deeper by dredging a channel the entrance improvement will be almost valueless. This is the improvement covered by my amendment and termed Grays Harbor and Chehalis River.

The project that I am talking about now was adopted prior to the bar entrance project. It was estimated to cost $150,000. Seventy-five thousand dollars were appropriated; $65,000 and over have been expended. A depth of 2 or 3 feet additional was secured by washing, but it was hoped that by confining the water to a channel it would wash out the channel to the required depth, 16 or 18 feet. It was found, however, that the soil was of a very different character from what they expected in the first place, and the engineer says it is of such a refractory nature that it will require dredging in order to do it. Now, I want to call your attention to what the engineer says in the report of 1896, prior to the beginning of this bar entrance work. Here is what he says as to the bar entrance work and proposed improvement:

The proposed improvement at the entrance to the harbor, calling for a channel 20 feet in depth at low water over the bar, will probably be started at an early date. A plan for this improvement was submitted on March 20, 1895, and authority for the commencement of the improvement under this plan was given by the river and harbor act of June 3, 1896.

At present the deep water of the lower harbor is separated from the deep water of the upper harbor by two bars. One is below Hoquiam, commonly known as the Lower Shoal, having a low-water depth of very nearly 12 feet, and the other above Hoquiam and below Aberdeen, commonly known as Cow Point Bar, having a low-water depth of only 8 feet.

The character of these shoals is a refractory material, and if removed, will have to be by dredging, aided, perhaps, by a deflecting dike from the westerly end of Rennies Island.

Unless the channel to the upper inner harbor is deep enough to permit shipping which may be enabled to enter the lower harbor to reach the harbor towns and mills which are located on the upper inner harbor, the value of the improvement of the outer bar will be greatly diminished.

I repeat that the value of this improvement that Congress has provided for will be very greatly diminished if this Government refuses to make a small appropriation for this inner harbor in order to allow vessels that can enter the outer harbor to reach the town and business of the harbor. In other words, the Government is in this position: It is like a man with a magnificent mansion, constructed with beautiful rooms, nice hall ways, and doors, without any stairway to get from one floor to the other. The question is whether this Congress will refuse to make the necessary appropriations to get the full benefit of this million-dollar improvement. The engineer says this can be done at a reasonable expense. His language is as follows:

It is practicable to obtain a channel 18 feet at mean lower low water at a reasonable cost over these troublesome shoals, and it is believed that such a channel would be permanent when once obtained, and that it is all that will be required for several years.

The estimated cost of a channel 100 feet wide at the bottom and 18 feet deep at mean lower low water is $107,500.

Now, sir, will the Government allow an appropriation of $1,000,000 to be practically lost when $107,500 will save it? Furthermore, $65,000 have been expended in the construction of dikes; and yet this engineer states:

To even maintain the depth which has already been obtained, it will be necessary to make quite extensive repairs to the dikes heretofore constructed. The cost of these repairs as the dikes are at present is estimated at $18,500. The longer before repairs are made, the more will be the cost.

It seems to me, sir, that this Congress ought to appropriate at least enough to maintain the improvements which have already been made, and that we should appropriate something to enable us to derive the proper benefit from an appropriation of $1,000,000 at the entrance of this harbor.

Now, that is the condition. I propose to tell this committee—and I believe that they will see the justice of it when they look into it—that we should have appropriations not only for continuing this inner improvement, but for making the repairs.

I propose to put in my remarks a statement from the commercial bodies relative to the business done in that locality, and also the detailed recommendations of the engineer. I will at this time simply call attention to a brief statement of that business and how it has increased within the last four years.

The following table shows the exports and imports for each calendar year since and including 1896:

Year.	Tons.	Value.
1896	110,748	$939,677
1897	150,906	1,071,747
1898	168,468	1,252,089
1899	265,918	1,979,998

This is the business of the harbor as distinguished from the business of the Chehalis River, which is about 3,000 tons.

I wish to say that this is one of the greatest harbors on the Pacific coast. It has tributary to it probably the most magnificent lumber region that there is in the United States. About 60,000,000,000 feet of lumber is tributary to this harbor. Trees two and three hundred feet high and eight and ten feet in diameter of the finest kind of lumber. A million feet of lumber are manufactured on this harbor every dry. And there are ships being built there; two or three years ago there were two built; in the past year three or four; and to-day there are four or five in course of construction at these towns.

I am asking this appropriation not alone for the benefit of Grays Harbor—not alone for the State of Washington—but for the benefit of the United States, and for the utilization of a million dollars already expended there, or that will be expended there within one year. I ask this committee in justice to the interests of this Government that they propose to look after, that we authorize this additional improvement.

The following are the detailed recommendations of the engineers as to repairs:

RECOMMENDATIONS.

I respectfully recommend the following for future improvements in Grays Harbor and Chehalis River, based on my study during the last three years:

Chehalis River Dikes.—The brush filling of these several dikes, the length of which aggregate 1,476 feet, has settled considerably. I estimate the top of this filling to stand at an elevation of about 4 feet below the level desired to be maintained. Some of the timberwork is broken and will need to be replaced. To make these repairs, it is estimated the following quantities of materials will be required, at about the following cost:

[In place.]

250 cords brush, at $2.50	$625
5,000 feet B. M. lumber, at $12	60
500 pounds spikes, at 3 cents	15
500 tons stone, at 70 cents	350
Total	1,050

Cow Point Dike.—The total length of this structure is 8,486 feet, of which 1,000 feet is a mattress sill without timberwork. It is estimated that this dike will require a general refilling of from 1½ to 2 feet for its entire length, and that the timberwork will have been destroyed in places owing to the heavy drift which is ever present in the vicinity of this dike. To make the repairs, it is estimated that materials in the following quantities will be required:

[In place.]

400 cords brush, at $2.50	$1,000
15,000 feet B. M. lumber, at $12	180
1,500 pounds spikes, 6 and 8 inch, at 3 cents	45
600 tons stone, at 70 cents	420
100 bolts, at 20 cents	20
Total	1,665

Middle Channel Dike.—The physical condition of this structure is such that I do not believe it would be safe to repair it along the lines of the old specifications and plan. I am inclined to think that better results and a greater insurance of permanency would be obtained by filling the lower side of this dike with stone to about the level of low water and then filling the remainder of the dike with brush. Based on this plan, material in about the following quantities will be required:

[In place.]

10,000 tons stone, at 70 cents	$7,000
500 cords brush, at $2.50	1,250
10,000 feet B. M. lumber, at $12	120
1,000 pounds spikes, at 3 cents	30
100 bolts, at 20 cents	20
Total	8,420

New work (3,500 feet protection sill).—For the construction of this work, which would be in two parts, 2,000 feet at the south end of the Middle Channel Dike across the flats, and 1,500 feet at the east end of the present protection sill along the ship channel, materials in about the following quantities will be required:

[In place.]

2,100 linear feet piles, at 8 cents	$728
1,200 cords brush, at $2.50	3,000
2,500 tons stone, at 70 cents	1,750
11,000 feet B. M. lumber, at $12	132
1,100 pounds spikes, at 3 cents	33
Total	5,643

DREDGING.

Chehalis River.—The improvement of the Chehalis River in accordance with the approved plan calls for dredging a channel 16 feet at half tide through four shoals below Montesano, so that coasting vessels can reach that town. At the time this project for improvement was formulated there was a sawmill located at Montesano, which town was the terminus of the Grays Harbor branch of the Northern Pacific Railroad.

Small, shallow-draft, steam coasting vessels, the extreme draft of which did not exceed 10 feet, occasionally went as far as Montesano, and I am informed that two flat-bottomed schooners have lain at the mill wharf. Since this time the sawmill has burned down, and for the past three years neither steam nor sail coasting vessels have been farther up the river than Cosmopolis, which is 12 miles below Montesano. The Northern Pacific Railway Company has extended its line as far as Aberdeen and Ocosta. A line of shallow draft stern-wheel boats make two trips daily between Montesano and the lower harbor towns. These steamers experience but little difficulty at the shoals, the greatest trouble being on account of snags, which after each freshet lodge at different points along the river.

In view of the foregoing facts and the heavy and refractory nature of the material composing the shoals which would be expensive to remove by dredging, it was recommended by Captain Symons that this project be reconsidered and the dredging of these shoals be abandoned.

Cow Point Bar.—It was supposed at the time the plan for improvement of inner Grays Harbor was outlined that this bar was composed of sand, and that by the construction of the dike partly closing the south channel the increased tidal flow over the bar would scour it away. Borings made on this bar in July and August, 1895, show it to consist of tough clay, which will not wash or scour. As a consequence, in order to obtain the desired depth of 16 feet at half tide, as outlined by the approved plan of improvement, dredging will have to be resorted to.

The commerce of Grays Harbor is constantly increasing. During the last year nearly 300 cargoes of lumber left Grays Harbor, of which about half that number crossed this shoal. Considerable delay is experienced in getting ships to sea, owing to Cow Point Bar, it requiring two tides to get them out.

Lower Shoal.—The prospective improvement at the entrance of the harbor calling for a channel 20 feet deep at low water over the bar will necessitate the deepening of the channel in the inner harbor to a corresponding depth in order that shipping entering the harbor can reach the towns and mills located on the upper inner harbor.

The appearance of rock at Cow Point at a depth of about 18 feet below mean lower low water makes this depth the maximum to which the channel can be improved, except by the costly removal of submerged rock.

About 2 miles below Hoquiam there is a middle ground in the north channel. At present the bulk of the flood tide passes to the north of this middle ground, whereas the bulk of the ebb passes to the south of it, the results of which are two shallow channels, neither of which appears to occupy the most favorable position.

The velocity of the ebb tide in this vicinity is about one and one-half times that of the flood tide.

To improve either channel which runs north or south of the middle ground at the expense of the other would necessitate the construction of a deflecting dike near the mouth of the Hoquiam River, which would interfere with the established harbor lines and form a menace to navigation.

It seems to me that the establishment of a new channel through the middle ground, following as nearly as possible the general direction of the ebb tide and at the same time in prolongation of the general direction of the flood tide, would provide a channel in a more direct line, and one whose depth would be maintained by the action of both the flood and ebb tides.

The total cost of the repairs to dikes already constructed is about as follows:

Repairs to Chehalis River dikes	$1,050
Repairs to Cow Point Dike	1,665
Repairs to Middle Channel Dike	8,420
Construction of protection sill across Mud Flats	5,643
	16,778
Engineering, contingencies, etc	1,722
Total	18,500

I submit the following from the chambers of commerce named:

To the Congress of the United States of America:

Your memorialists, the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Aberdeen, the Commercial Club of the city of Hoquiam, the Business Men's Club of the city of Montesano, the Improvement Club of the city of Cosmopolis, the Merchants' Club of the city of Elma, the Commercial Club of the city of Ocosta, the Board of Trade of the city of Westport, all of Chehalis County, southwestern Washington, respectfully present to your honorable body the urgent need of deepening the inner channels of Grays Harbor, as recommended in the Annual Report of the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, to the Secretary of War for the year 1896, Part V, Appendix U U, report of Captain Taylor, pages 3336 and 3337. The amount therein recommended for improvements needed is $125,000.

We beg to call your attention to the following facts respecting tributary country, present industries, commerce, and benefits to shipping; also the increase in wealth of the nation that will result from such improvements, and to the shortened ocean route such improvements will give to the deep-draft commerce of the North Pacific Ocean:

First. The area drained into Grays Harbor is about 4,140 square miles, nearly equal to the area of the State of Connecticut, which has an area of 4,845 square miles.

Second. The area of the "Olympic Peninsula," set off from Puget Sound by high mountain ranges and accessible to Grays Harbor as its only shipping port, is 2,866 square miles; nearly equal to the area of Rhode Island and Delaware, which have an area of 3,045 square miles.

Third. The entire area looking to Grays Harbor as its proper shipping port is then nearly equal to the States of Connecticut, Rhode Island, and Delaware combined, now sustaining a population of 1,521,291 inhabitants.

Fourth. This area is estimated to contain one-third of the timber of the State of Washington, or about 100,000,000,000 feet.

Fifth. The best markets for this timber are Asia, Africa, Australia, the Islands, South America, and Europe, from which it is only excluded by the depth of water at the entrance, now under improvement, and inner channels of Grays Harbor, which exclude suitable vessels for long voyages.

Sixth. We estimate the value of this timber for foreign shipment to be at least $1 per thousand more than for coastwise or Eastern shipment; therefore that the improvement of the entrance to Grays Harbor, now under rapid construction, and the deepening of inner channels, the subject of this memorial, would add $100,000,000 to the wealth of the nation from this one source.

Seventh. This area is largely fertile land; many rivers fall from adjacent mountains and offer fine water powers for manufacturing purposes. The value of the proposed improvement to the immense population this area will some day sustain, therefore to the wealth of the nation, can not be estimated.

Eighth. This area is rich in minerals, coal, iron, and choice clays predominating.

Ninth. The improvement of these channels, in connection with improvements now in progress at the entrance of our harbor, would shorten the route of travel and commerce from the State of Washington to California and Mexico over 200 miles; avoid navigation in stormy latitudes; also the long and expensive tow incident to Puget Sound ports.

Tenth. In face of present inadequate depth of entrance and of inner channels our coastwise exports have grown from nothing in 1881 to be fourth in importance on the Pacific coast in 1900, the ports of San Francisco, Puget Sound, and Columbia River only being greater.

Eleventh. The improvement of our channels would offer stimulus to manufacture, agriculture, and mining, increase the commerce of this port, therefore increase the commerce and wealth of our nation.

Twelfth. Number of vessels leaving Grays Harbor in the year ending December 31, 1899, was 286, carrying coastwise 82,000,000 and foreign nearly 14,000,000 feet of lumber, and other products to the total of nearly 164,000 tons. Report of Chief of Engineers, Appendix U U, 1899.

The number of cars of lumber and shingles leaving our county by rail during the year 1899 is estimated at 5,000, or 75,000 tons. (Statistics, Northern Pacific Railway freight department.)

We also respectfully refer, for information concerning commerce, resources, and proposed improvement of the inner channels of Grays Harbor, to report of United States Engineer Maj. Thomas W. Symons for the year 1895, and to that of his successor, Capt. Harry Taylor, for the years 1896, 1897, 1898, and 1899; to the report for the State of Washington, by Henry Gannett, Chief of the Division of Forestry, United States Agricultural Department, published at the Government Printing Office in the year 1900, giving areas and estimates of timber tributary to Grays Harbor; to special consular reports entitled "American Lumber in Foreign Markets," Volume XI, giving the value of our lumber and its use in the markets of the world; to the various surveys of Grays Harbor by the different departments of the Government, showing the depth of water in our channels and at our entrance, and the improved condition at the entrance brought about by the appropriations already expended.

Thirteenth. In view of the facts herein stated, your memorialists urge upon your honorable body the immediate necessity of an appropriation adequate to the expeditious carrying forward of the improvements estimated and recommended by the Chief of Engineers' Report, 1896. This expenditure is a part of your original plan for the improvement of Grays Harbor, as is fully set forth in said report. The appropriation asked for by your memorialists is the amount recommended, $125,000.

That you may appropriate the requisite funds your memorialists will ever pray.

Dated Chehalis County, Wash., this 19th day of December, A. D. 1900.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, for nearly twenty years I have thought that I discovered in the river and harbor bill evidences of the wasteful expenditure of the public money. When I first made that discovery the bill appropriated $19,000,000. The country at that time was, I might almost say, horrified at so vast an expenditure. Yet this bill carries $60,000,000; and another bill which will be before us shortly, to provide for carrying on works of improvement that have been already authorized, will carry an expenditure of eight or ten millions more.

I recognize the fact that many of the improvements authorized are wise and judicious. I think that perhaps this bill has as few meretricious propositions in it as any one; and I will say here, Mr. Chairman, that I would be content to allow the present chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee to prepare a bill, satisfied that it would represent nothing but material interest. But the chairman can not do that; he has 16 colleagues, and all of those gentlemen have their special interests which they feel compelled to advocate.

I think this policy is a mistake. I do not believe that gentlemen strengthen themselves by this wanton, this reckless, expenditure of money. I remember an instance. There was a gentleman here from the State of Oregon—a gentleman beloved by all his colleagues—who devoted himself to securing appropriations for his State. They were colossal in amount, and yet they were not sufficient to meet the constantly growing appetite of his people—contractors and interested persons—and when the time came that he had reached the limit, they struck him down because he could not continue these extraordinary appropriations.

I see seated before me now a gentleman who has done more to secure appropriations for the Mississippi River Commission and for that enterprise than any other gentleman in this House. In season and out of season he has labored until more than $41,000,000 has been thrown away in abortive attempts to improve the navigation of the Mississippi River. Each year commerce on that stream has dwindled.

I can remember a time when there were many lines of magnificent steamers plying the length of that river. Where are they now? You do not find them. There are scarcely as many tugboats on the river to-day as there were magnificent palatial steamers forty years ago. Last night, to my astonishment, I found in my mail an unsigned letter calling my attention to a newspaper article which I would receive in that mail. To my surprise, I found that it was an assault on my friend from Mississippi who has done so much for his people because he had not done more. It contained a speech of PATRICK HENRY—I do not know whether it was the shade of the Revolutionary orator or some one in being—an assault on my friend because he had secured only a beggarly $2,000,000 and more for the purpose of building levees in that State. The charge was made that he had not secured for the rivers of that State—and I undertake to say that there is no gentleman here who could name three of the dozen rivers named—as large appropriations as some predecessor of his had, although those appropriations amounted to two hundred and more thousand dollars. The complaint was that four of the rivers, after years of appropriation, had disappeared from the river and harbor bill.

Ah, gentlemen, this thing is perennial. It never does to complete a work of this kind. It never does to put it in such a situation that it may be dropped, with its attendant hundreds of thousands of dollars, from the river and harbor bill. The work must go on and on and on; and unless you are able to secure these sums which are demanded, I warn you, gentlemen, you are not helping yourselves in the end by these extraordinary appropriations.

Why, think of it—you gentlemen who have been colleagues of General CATCHINGS—that any man should charge him with dereliction of duty in not securing ample appropriations to build up the levees of his State and protect the plantations of the State from the inundating waters of the Mississippi!

Democrat as he is, strict constructionist as he is, he has gone infinitely further than my friend on my right who spoke a moment ago. He finds constitutional warrant for keeping water away from private lands, while my friend can not find constitutional warrant for putting water on Government lands. [Laughter.] And right here I might say that this is one of the evidences of progressive Democracy. The gentleman from Missouri asked a question of the gentleman from Ohio a little while ago. I can remind him when it was for the first time a prominent Democrat in the United States took the position that a river, an interior river, could properly be the subject of improvement by the Government of the United States.

It was when Mr. Calhoun made his speech in the city of Memphis, in 1845, at a river-improvement convention held there at the time. He then said that the original Democrats had believed that a harbor, if upon the sea, might be a subject of improvement. Later they progressed, and took the position that if it was upon tide water it was a proper subject of improvement; but now he was willing to say that if the stream crossed the border of a State line it was thereby nationalized and made a subject of improvement; and there for the first time the Democratic party got itself upon this doctrine that the gentleman from Mississippi has so expanded as that under the general-welfare clause we can now protect the plantation of a Mississippi planter from the invading waters of the Mississippi River by building a levee all around it.

Mr. Chairman, gentlemen have said here that this bill brought its blessings to all parts of the country and to all constituencies alike. I deny it. It is not true. I have in my hand an executive document, I presume published under the sanction of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. It is a statement in detail of the appropriations that have been made, amounting to more than $330,000,000, for this class of improvements. There is a table, a recapitulation by States, the last table in the volume.

Mr. VANDIVER. May I ask the gentleman how far back it goes?

Mr. HEPBURN. I think it is from the early times up to 1867. Here is the statement. Recapitulation of total appropriations by States. The total is $330,863,642.14. Remember the cents, gentlemen. I am not sure that it is accurate, but it is a committee's publication, I assume. I find that the total for the State of Iowa, the appropriations are represented to be $2,500; the State of Michigan, $21,891,000. Now, gentlemen, the State of Michigan and the State of Iowa alike are beneficiaries so far as interstate commerce is concerned. They stand alike. That serves the purpose of the Iowa farmer. It is the means many of them utilize in getting grain to market; but there is a local advantage; that is, a local advantage to the man in Michigan, because it enables him to use these waterways for that traffic that is State, not interstate. It does away with the necessity of so many miles of railway; it gives him cheaper and easier transportation for his local traffic; and, in addition to that, it gives him the great benefit of the expenditures in Michigan, to the people of Michigan, because these expenditures are largely items of labor.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. Certainly.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The gentleman from Iowa certainly would not claim that there is any analogy whatever between the location of his State and the location of Michigan.

Mr. HEPBURN. Oh, thank God, not.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Perhaps we can say, "Oh, thank God, not," on our side. Our State is wave washed and surrounded by water; it is a peninsula.

Mr. HEPBURN. Are you making this speech? I thought you were going to ask me a question.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I am going to ask you a question. Does not the Federal Government exercise jurisdiction over every harbor and in every navigable water; and is it not right that it assume the responsibility thereof and keep them in proper condition to subserve their natural purposes?

Mr. HEPBURN. It assumes the responsibility, but its jurisdiction is not exercised except for the benefit of your people only; but because it exercises this jurisdiction, are you going to base upon that a demand that all the other people shall make contribution?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Is not St. Marys River a great international waterway, and does it not serve every State in the West, as well as the State of Michigan?

Mr. HEPBURN. I say that it does; and if the gentleman had listened to what I have said he would have known that I did say in regard to interstate commerce we had the same interest with Michigan, but with regard to the commerce that is local to Michigan—State commerce—you have advantages we do not have, and in addition you have the benefit coming from the expenditure in your midst. This money goes into the pockets of the people of Michigan; so that I say there are two advantages that you have that we in Iowa do not have, disproving the proposition that the benefits of this river and harbor bill fall equally upon all the people.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. If the gentleman from Iowa will permit me again. We have the same internal facilities of transportation that Iowa has, we have the railroads, but we have the necessity confronting us of keeping our harbors in proper condition. The gentleman would not drive a vessel the whole length of Lake Michigan to get a harbor in Wisconsin when there was a nearer harbor in Michigan. We must keep up the improvements and keep these waterways in condition, or allow the harbors to fill up and imperil the lives of those engaged in commerce upon the lakes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. HEPBURN. I supposed I was yielding to a question. I did not know I was yielding to a speech. I have no doubt it will be a better one.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I do not admit that. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized among his associates here as the best debater on this floor and I have no disposition to trouble him further.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman says we are driven to take care of her harbors. You are driven to coerce the Government of the United States to take care of the harbors for your local traffic.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. That is a most narrow view to take of it.

Mr. HEPBURN. It is the correct view. You have precisely the same advantage for your interstate commerce that we have in Iowa. Then you have the sole advantage for your local commerce that we do not have. Then you have the sole advantage of the expenditure of the money going into your pockets that we do not have. Therefore I say that there is a special advantage, and there is some reason for the extraordinary industry and zeal that is manifested on this placard that we have here in the Hall.

And right here let me say that there are gentlemen, I understand, who are taking exception because some gentleman has seen fit to make a public statement of what they have done. What are you angry about, gentlemen? About the notoriety given to the act or the act itself? [Laughter.] I am not here to quarrel. I take it that an explanation that was made here is perhaps entirely proper. Naturally those great States that have a water front and that have water communication are interested, and naturally their Representatives would seek places on that committee. That is right and proper. But I do not think that any one of these gentlemen has a right to regard himself as insulted, treated with indignity, simply because somebody has seen fit in a public way to show by contrast what has been done.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. HEPBURN. Certainly.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa if he has ever investigated the question whether in other countries where these improvements are made, a part of the cost of them is ever assessed upon the locality in which they are made?

Mr. HEPBURN. I had supposed that in many instances it was all assessed on the locality.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I do not know myself, and I ask simply for information.

Mr. HEPBURN. I have never given careful attention to that matter, but I have supposed that many of the greatest works of that character have been conducted to completion by localities, just as the city of Chicago has, unaided by the Government, completed the most magnificent improvement in connection with hydraulics in this country. Now, Mr. Chairman, I say that in order to make this bill a fair one there ought to be some provision by which these States that can not in the nature of things be beneficiaries under this law should have a corresponding appropriation at least equal to that which would represent the local value to the State, the use of these waterways for State commerce. I take it that the gentleman from Michigan does not desire and insist that the Federal Government shall aid in any way any transportation of the local merchandise of the State of Michigan. Surely he would not. And yet when these waterways are provided they are provided for all purposes, the same for the State as for national purposes, and he does get that benefit. Now, I say that justice and fairness require that the other States should have in some way or other an equivalent for that peculiar advantage.

Mr. WEEKS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Mr. WEEKS. I would like to have the gentleman state how the appropriation should be made for the benefit of the State that has no rivers and harbors.

Mr. HEPBURN. I am not prepared to say just how it should be made, but I might suggest to the gentleman that, take these Western States, with the rich, deep loam that has no limestone base that is accessible, that can not have the good roads that you have in Pennsylvania and in many other States, aid could be given in that direction. We do not have the sandy soil that you have in very many parts of Michigan. There are States where the road problem is one of terrible significance. There are months in the year in the region of country where I live that the highways are practically impassable, and there is an embargo on travel, and often from farm to farm. We have no stone, we have no sand, we have the rich, deep soil that when the frost comes out in the spring, or when the rains are unusual, make it into mud so deep that the wagon will sink almost out of sight.

Mr. WEEKS. Would the gentleman have that appropriation for roads in the States that have no rivers and harbors, made in the river and harbor bill?

Mr. HEPBURN. I am not talking about where it should be made; I am trying to get into the mind of the gentleman, if I can, some slight conception of the justice there ought to be in appropriations of this kind.

Mr. Chairman, there is another measure that I wish to speak about and in regard to which I think the committee is making a great mistake. In the last appropriation bill they started upon a new departure that will have no end, gentlemen, no end. I refer to the harbor of New York upon which millions of dollars have been spent; a harbor that was supposed to be in perfect condition. One would have supposed it no longer needed the care of this bill. But the newspapers announced that upon the stocks, in some shipyard in Glasgow, there was a vessel that would draw 34 feet. No such vessel had ever been built, no such vessel had ever appeared, but straightway the Representatives from that great State came to the River and Harbor Committee with the proposition that New York Harbor must be fitted for the advent of that vessel, if, perchance, that vessel ever should come to American waters. And at once there was a proposition engrafted upon the bill to widen and deepen the channel, giving them a depth of 35 feet, 2,000 feet wide, from the point of the island out beyond the bar.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Forty feet.

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman from Massachusetts corrects me by saying the depth was to be 40 feet. I think that was the proposition originally, but it was modified, as I understand, to 35 feet. Two thousand feet wide! It has been developed in this debate that in the Detroit River, where more commerce passes during the twelve months of the year than at any other spot on earth, the channel is but 300 feet wide, and the committee proposes in this bill to double its width. In that fast moving stream, with many sharp angles, 600 feet is deemed a sufficient width of channel for the passage of the greatest volume of commerce that is congregated at any one point in the whole surface of the earth, yet at New York the proposition is to give a breadth of channel of more than three times what is proposed for the channel of the Detroit River and more than six times the width that has served the uses of commerce in the Detroit River all these years.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York rose.

Mr. HEPBURN. I will yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he knows that there is a line of steamers drawing 34 feet of water running from Liverpool to an Australian port, and that the owners of that line applied in New York for wharfage in order to run such a line to New York?

Mr. HEPBURN. I did not know it. I remember reading some years ago the statement in regard to this vessel being upon the stocks, accompanied with the statement that it was the only vessel in the world drawing more than 30 feet. My information is based upon that statement. If the gentleman has other information, I shall be glad to be corrected.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. I will say to the gentleman that within the last six months application was made in New York Harbor for wharfage facilities for vessels of 34 feet draft.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, that raises the pertinent inquiry, Are we to adapt our entire harbor system to the depth of a few vessels, or by establishing our own water depth are we going to compel the conformation of vessels to that? Shall we expend millions upon millions because some shipbuilder sees fit occasionally to give this greater draft to his vessels, or shall we say to him, "If you want the trade of our ports, you must conform your vessels to our 30-foot standard."

Now, Mr. Chairman, if this appropriation of six or eight or ten million dollars—whatever it may be—for New York Harbor were the last—if that were all, it would not so much matter. But here comes the city of Boston insisting that Boston must not be discriminated against. Boston was "the cradle of liberty." Boston has Bunker Hill Monument. Only a few miles from Boston Lexington and Concord furnished battlefields of great renown, and therefore Boston must not be discriminated against. And the complaisant River and Harbor Committee, probably in order to hold the Massachusetts delegation to the support of this bill, is compelled (I am satisfied against the will of the chairman) to authorize an appropriation for this purpose. And next year will come Philadelphia, where the Declaration of Independence was signed. [Laughter.] And a little while after that will come Baltimore, the home of the man who wrote the "Star-Spangled Banner." [Laughter.]

And a little later will come Charleston, S. C., which has the site of old Fort Moultrie, where was exhibited such heroic valor a century and a quarter ago. What a blessing it is to some people that they have ancestors. [Laughter.] Charleston must have her 35 feet. And then New Orleans. They are after it now. They want the improvement of the Southwest Passage. A few years ago, when they were clamoring for the expenditure of many millions to accomplish the jetty system, they told us here that the method to be adopted for the proper control of the Mississippi River was the policy of concentration—to concentrate all the waters in one exit—to get the rush of the current and scour out the bottom. That was the theory then. Now, in order to get this 35 feet depth they have changed all their theories of engineering, and to-day the policy and the demand is dispersion. "Let us have as many mouths as possible to the Mississippi River; let us have the Southwest Pass improved, the South Pass, the Southeast Pass," and then after a while we may possibly be met with the proposition (although I can not speak for New Orleans) that the Atchafalaya must be opened in order to give some further benefits perhaps to the State of Texas.

Mr. McDERMOTT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. HEPBURN. If his question is a pertinent one in connection with what I am discussing.

Mr. McDERMOTT. As I understand, under the present system of taxation the money can be provided to meet the $60,000,000 of expenditure that the gentleman is talking of without creating a deficit in the Treasury. That being so, if the $60,000,000 is not subtracted from the United States Treasury by these expenditures, more or less for State or national benefit, how are you to get $60,000,000 out of the Treasury and distribute it among the people?

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, I do not know that that money has been accumulated for the purpose of distribution among the people. That seems to be the idea of the river and harbor bill, but it has never been my idea.

Mr. McDERMOTT. What method do you propose for getting it out?

Mr. HEPBURN. I propose none. I am not discussing that question. We will cross that bridge when we get to it.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I should like to ask the gentleman from Iowa, if the great percentage of the foreign commerce of the world is being done at the present time by vessels drawing 30 feet of water—and I think the statistics will show that practically all the tonnage that is being built at the present time for ocean traffic is being built with that draft—whether it is not as essential for the protection and advancement of American commerce to expend the money appropriated in this bill for the widening and deepening of harbors to admit these vessels as it is to expend the $150,000,000 of the people's money for the construction of the Nicaragua Canal, which has for its purpose the advancement of American commerce, and a project which we all believe in?

Mr. HEPBURN. I think there is a very great difference. The great work to which the gentleman refers is in its very essence and of necessity national in character. It will benefit the commerce of all States alike, or the people thereof. There is no local advantage secured by anyone. All the commerce that will pass through that canal will be interstate and international commerce. It will not be the commerce of a single State.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, I would rather not. I do not see that that question was especially pertinent to my argument one way or the other. But the gentleman is always full of what are supposed to be catches or traps. He has always "got one up his sleeve" which, with a bland smile and a mellifluous brogue, he thrusts into the debate. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I should like to have the gentleman answer my question in his own Western brogue. I have not heard the answer yet.

Mr. HEPBURN. No; and you will not hear an answer. I can not answer and be polite.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I hope the gentleman will continue to be a gentleman on the floor of the House.

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, I hope so; and perhaps that is not beyond the domain of hope in my case. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Well, I trust not.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I want to speak with reference to the one matter in this bill that affects my people locally. One county in my district borders upon the Missouri River. The Missouri River has received the attention of the river and harbor bill for a long time and very many millions of dollars have been expended upon it with a view to improving its navigation. Now, there may be some stretches of that river in the extreme upper regions of it or near its mouth where there is some commerce, but in this portion of the river upon which my district abuts I am informed that one steamboat passed up the river last summer—the first steamboat attempting to do that in ten years.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Did they ever get it down again?

Mr. HEPBURN. It is not intended that it should come down. Away up near Fort Benton there is a stretch of the river, a few hundred miles it may be, because the Missouri is a very long stream, up above the mouth of the Yellowstone, where the slope of the river is but little, where there is some steamboat navigation, and there are three or four boats on that stretch of the river. As they are not built there and usually are built at Pittsburg, they have to use the lower river in getting to the seat of their industry.

Mr. CORLISS. During high water.

Mr. HEPBURN. Now, the great trouble is this: It is utterly impossible to navigate that river cheaply, the slope of the river is so great. It is a foot and one one-hundredth of a foot per mile from Sioux City to its mouth—more than double the slope of the Mississippi River from St. Louis to Cairo; three times the slope of the river from Cairo to Vicksburg; six times the slope of the river from Vicksburg to the Gulf.

So that if it were possible to straighten the river and remove the sand bars the velocity would be so great that it could not be cheaply navigated. The vessels would be like the fast liners that cross the Atlantic. All their space would be taken up by powerful machinery and by coal bunkers and there would be no room left for freight. No one except the engineers, the contractors, and the Representatives who have a false idea that appropriations strengthen them at home have ever advocated an attempt to improve the navigation of the Missouri River. Those are the three classes of people. Now, that river, where it affects Iowa, flows through a magnificent valley almost as level as a billiard table, from 5 to 25 miles in width. There is a soil from 10 to 20 feet in depth. Below that soil there is a stratum of sand. When the river is low and its surface is opposite this stratum of sand it eats in, constantly undermining, and I have seen stretches of it half as wide as this room and half a mile long drop into the river at once. That vast amount of matter is taken up in solution, that rich soil is carried on down, aiding to give the muddy and the turbid appearance that the waters of the river have.

It is in time deposited lower down and forms an obstruction in the shape of a sandbar. What I think ought to be done even to improve the navigation of the Lower Mississippi is to prevent this vast volume of drift, as we call it, composed of vegetable matter, some sand, some lime, and some clay, from being dropped into the river. If by means of small and inexpensive dikes the Secretary of War was authorized to divert the current from these washing places where it is in contact with the bank, infinite good could be done. An appropriation of $600,000, in my judgment, would do that. It would start a current across the river, it is true. It would strike 2 or 3 miles below on the opposite bank, but one of these barriers made of mattresses formed of willows and of wire and weighted with rock an angle of 30° from the bank would soon have behind it a solid bank, and that would protect the river in its whole length where it is now making the dangerous and expensive incursions.

When I went into the region of country where I live, thirty-four years ago, the town of Hamburg was our port of entry, so to speak. We had no railways. There were then a few boats making occasional visits up the river. I remember hauling shingles from there thirty-four years ago. The town was upon the bank of the river. To-day it is 8 miles from the river. The river has wandered off toward the Nebraskans, and has destroyed the greater portion of that region between its old location and the present one. Now, it may be said that this improvement, of which I have spoken, is not in the interest of navigation—that it is for the protection of the Iowa farmer. May I not suggest that the committee are estopped from making that statement, for they have appropriated $41,000,000 already for the protection of the Southern farmer. But it will be said, "We have only spent $15,000,000 in building levees in the last twenty years."

I undertake to say that the other twenty-six million would never have been demanded if it had not been the desire to get the fifteen million; for I want to make the statement now, in the presence of the champion of these improvements, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS], who has done so much to secure them, and who, perhaps, is sometimes now saying to himself, "How sharper than a serpent's tooth it is to have a thankless child." I want to say in his presence that there has been no substantial improvement in the navigation of the Mississippi River in the last twenty-two years. I am ready to stand by that statement and to submit it to the dispassionate judgment of any man on earth except one interested in the river and harbor bill and an engineer of the United States Army.

I remember the President of the United States, Mr. Cleveland, in a message to Congress, referred to this matter, and while he was a great friend of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS], I acquit that gentleman from any suspicion of inspiring the suggestion of the message. President Cleveland said that after the expenditure of—I have forgotten how many millions, probably twenty-nine millions or something like that—they had secured an improvement to the extent of 5 inches on the New Madrid reach, I think, and 7 inches of depth on the Plum Point reach. If I am wrong in my figures—I am not about the inches—if I am wrong in any of my figures, the gentleman from Mississippi will correct me.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if we can make these appropriations for the protection of the plantations in Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Tennessee, can we not do the same thing for the protection of the farmers in Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, and Dakota?

You gentlemen do not appreciate how serious this matter is. A farmer goes to bed at night the owner of 160 acres of as prolific land as there is under the sun. He gets up in the morning and sees that a current is setting across the Iowa side of the river. The river is low and he sees that the bank has broken away and that he has a strip a rod or two wide and half a mile long less than he had when he went to bed. So it goes on and on until in three months' time that splendid farm has absolutely disappeared. Towns have been so treated. East Nebraska City was once a flourishing town on the eastern bank of the Missouri River. To-day the Missouri River is some distance east of the most easterly building in that town. St. Marys, in Mills County, was once a flourishing town. It has absolutely disappeared, and its site is 2 miles over in the State of Nebraska.

I think this matter is one of national importance, because all of you gentlemen are interested in the preservation of the corn belt. You must remember that there is but little of it in the world. That region of country that produces corn in its best condition is limited to six degrees of latitude and extends from Ohio only a couple of hundred miles west of the Missouri River. That is substantially all the corn land—I mean where corn is produced in greatest quantities and cheapest—that there is in the world. All are interested in these lands. Therefore I hope that when the time comes and the gentleman from the Eleventh Iowa district moves his amendment, asking an increase of this appropriation and that it may be used in maintaining the stability of the banks of the river, that all of you fair-minded men who want to disburse the blessings of the river and harbor bill so that they will fall, like the dews of heaven, upon the heads of all will vote for it with absolute content.

Mr. Chairman, I once said that I expected to live long enough to see a river and harbor bill carry $100,000,000. That was only a few years ago. We have got up to 60 per cent of my expectation. I expect to live, if you go on as you are going, if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] can not assert himself, if we do not see a change in our rules, so the Committee on Rivers and Harbors may consist of one person, and that the gentleman from Ohio, I expect to see the time when we will have more than a hundred million dollars appropriated and authorized.

Right here let me suggest to you this method of authorization is subtle and perilous. Would the gentleman from Ohio, would he have permitted this bill to bear his name if the appropriation was for $60,000,000 direct and the $8,000,000 that will be borne by the sundry civil bill—$68,000,000? I take it he would not; and I take it that he would have been able to go farther in the direction that he did go.

I do not suppose that I am telling any secrets—in fact it did not come to me as a secret—but that he did compel cutting off of $20,000,000 from this bill as it was originally drafted. The country should thank him for that. I say seriously, if we could put the responsibility on that gentleman I would be perfectly content to do it. We would have a river and harbor bill then that did not contain fads; we would have a river and harbor bill that was not filled with experiments; we would have a river and harbor bill that did not minister to the greed of localities and of individuals. It would be national in its character, and would represent only those works that were of national character and that did give equality of blessings to all who contribute to the expense.

But I see another danger looming up. Here are industrious young men from the far West. They are now at the head waters of those great streams. They can not ask for improvements for navigation, for they lack both navigation and commerce, and often even river way; but that does not necessarily put a limitation on desire, and they come to us with the plea that we must—we must—reclaim the arid lands. A little while ago they came with the proposition that we should give them the arid land. Many gentlemen thoughtlessly were willing to do it. But see what it would come to. Years ago the Congress of the United States gave the swamp lands and overflowed lands lying within the borders of the States to such States.

Shortly after that a gentleman from Mississippi—not the one that I have before me now, but another one—in conjunction with other gentlemen from Louisiana and from Arkansas and from those States to whom those lands had been given on the condition that they would reclaim them and add them to the arable acres of the United States. That was the plea—that that would be a benefit to them; that they were to be covered with corn, cotton, rice, and sugar. So they were given to the States. I think Louisiana nominally had about 10,000,000 acres, and I think Arkansas had—on paper, at least—6,000,000. I do not remember what the other States had; but after they had got the title to the lands, then they came up to us in a river and harbor bill for improving the Mississippi River, with a scheme so comprehensive that it would include the reclamation of those lands, saving them from that duty and expense upon which as a condition the lands were given to their States.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MONDELL. I wish to ask the gentleman from Iowa if he considers it fair—in view of the fact that he has just stated that the Government gave certain Southern States their lands with the understanding that they would reclaim them, and then appropriated for the construction of levees to protect them—is it now fair that this Congress should refuse to give Western States their arid land and at the same time refuse to extend aid in the reclamation of them.

Mr. HEPBURN. Why, certainly it is entirely fair to refuse to do that. Because a Congress has made a great mistake, because two Congresses or many Congresses have, where all men can see now that a mistake has been made, is it wise to go on in the light of experience, still blundering and still frittering away the public domain? I do not hesitate to say to the gentleman that I have another reason for that, a selfish one it is true, but I have it, and it is strong with me. When the time comes for the reclamation of this land and there is an agricultural necessity for it, when the product of the farm is insufficient for the food supply, then let the generation to be affected make these changes. To-day we have a surplus of farm products of hundreds of millions, a surplus that we have to send abroad in order to realize upon it at all.

Sending it abroad as a surplus we permit the consumer abroad to fix the price. That foreign price fixes the price of the product at home. There will be substantially no more farms until the arid-region lands are reclaimed. The available lands are now occupied. Every new one is a competitor in this overcrowded market with the farms that now exist. When we have such a population as will consume all we produce, which will probably be in twenty years, when thirty more million people will greet 1920, and we will consume the product that is our present surplus, then is the time; then is the hoped-for time for the Iowa farmer. Then he can fix his price in justice. [Loud applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Chairman, before beginning my remarks I would like to have brought into this Hall for display and inspection a chart to which I expect to refer as a part of my remarks and for illustration pertaining thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee have heard the request of the gentleman from Washington. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to make any remarks on the pending measure. I would not do so now if I felt that I could honorably sit still and keep still while this bill is being considered.

Paraphrasing a Democratic term, I have in this bill a "paramount" interest. Representing in part on the floor of this House the great State of Washington, a State filled with vast and varied productions, both agricultural and manufactured; a State that fronts upon the Pacific and looks out toward the East, and through whose maritime gateways is now flowing the increased and ever increasing commerce of the Orient, I must, in the very nature of affairs, have a very great interest in this bill.

My interest in this bill was so great that I arose from a sick bed in order to interview the members of the River and Harbor Committee with reference to this all-important measure. I now propose to submit to this House a few general observations on this bill that fell unheeded on the cold ears of that committee.

In the first place, let it be understood that I have no feeling of hostility whatsoever toward the work of improving by artificial means the splendid maritime highways of the nation. That is a great and good work that has my full sympathy. Indeed, it is my feeling in favor of the meritorious maritime needs of this nation, and not my hostility thereto that causes me to utter my feeble protest against the pending measure.

Here is a great appropriation bill—one of the greatest appropriation bills that this body is ever called upon to consider or pass; a bill that, in its provisions, carries millions of dollars; a bill that is seldom passed oftener than once in two years. Therefore, the man whose loyal constituency is victimized by the provisions of this bill, and who sits still on the floor of this House while it is passed, his mouth will be closed to utter any protest on this subject for two long years. Therefore, now is the appointed time.

A FAIR DIVISION.

It must be remembered that this bill is, or at least it ought to be, an appropriation bill for the rivers and harbors of the United States. I will endeavor to prove, by indisputable facts and figures, that this is an appropriation bill for the members of the River and Harbor Committee. In order to prove this, it is necessary for me, to some extent, to review very briefly the entire bill, because it is only by a review of the whole and a comparison of the parts that its unfairness may be shown. If a member of the River and Harbor Committee gets a million of dollars in this bill for his State, and another State, with an equally meritorious project, is turned down, it is no answer to the charge of unfairness to say that the first proposition was worthy, or was important, or was necessary. The question is, was it more worthy, more important, or more necessary than the other proposition which was turned down. All things in this world are relative, and their relation to each other is measured by comparisons one with the other.

THE DIVISION OF THE SANDWICH.

A few years ago I, in company with a few more young adventurers, climbed to the snowy summit of one of the grandest mountain peaks on the Western Hemisphere. The cold and hardship of that trip is a theme that beggars description. On our return from the summit in a semifrozen and starved condition we met an ascending mountaineer with a single sandwich. We wildly importuned for a division; but he sat calmly down in full view and devoured the entire biscuit, and excused himself by telling us how hungry he was. If in the future that man should ever be elected to Congress I bespeak for him a place on the River and Harbor Committee. [Laughter.]

A COWARDLY AND COMPLACENT PHILOSOPHY.

One member of the River and Harbor Committee—one of the direct beneficiaries of this unfair bill—has urged me not to make an attack upon this bill, because, forsooth, he said, that at some time in the future I might desire to secure appropriations for my State, and that I ought not to incur the hostility of the committee. That is a cowardly and complacent philosophy that finds no lodgment in my anatomy. I trust I shall always so demean myself as to retain the personal friendship of the gentlemen of that committee. I believe I have their friendship now, but they have not provided for my State in this bill. What warrant have I for supposing, if I refrain from an attack on this bill, that in the next bill the committee will do what they have failed to do in this one? According to the philosophy of my friend on the committee, if I attack the bill I get nothing, and if I refrain from attack I surely get nothing. Another case of "pay your money and take your choice."

Mr. McCULLOCH. What member of the committee said that to the gentleman?

Mr. CUSHMAN. I have no personal objection to giving the gentleman's name.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Give it.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I do not know whether it would be fair to the gentleman or not. I have no desire——

Mr. WHEELER (to Mr. CUSHMAN). I would not do it unless the gentleman consented.

Mr. BISHOP. Allow me to say that if any member of the committee made a suggestion of that kind it does not reflect the sentiment of the committee.

Mr. BALL. We would like to have the name, so as to know whether it is a fact or not.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I am not aware that the gentleman has any reason to doubt that it is a fact. If the gentleman concerned is willing, perhaps at a later stage in this debate I may give his name. It is continually stated here that the committee have reported unanimously in favor of this bill.

As I understand the duties of any of the great committees of this House, they are appointed to assist the House in legislation, and not to control it; to advise the House, and not to boss it. If we have reached the stage in this body where 17 men, however good and worthy they may be, can by simply giving their judgment on any matter in question control the vote and strangle the judgment of the 340 remaining members—I say if we have reached this point in Congressional legislation, I for one want to be definitely informed of the fact.

The honorable chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee has called particular attention to the fact that this bill has the unanimous support of the committee. To the new and uninitiated member on the floor of this House the one incomprehensible feature of Congressional legislation is the more than holy sanctity that surrounds and permeates that thing known as "the committee report." The superstitious never looked upon his fetich, nor the heathen gazed upon his idol, with one-half the holy awe that in this Chamber is accorded to that thing called "the committee report." There are members on the floor of this House that have violated the Ten Commandments and forgotten the lines of the doxology, but who expect to be saved from the hot hereafter because, forsooth, they have always voted with the committee! [Laughter.]

Perhaps I am wasting my time and trespassing upon the patience of this House by combating that which has received the sanction of the committee. Now, then, if this bill is fair and equitable in its provisions, it does not gain any additional sanctity by reason of having a committee report back of it; and if it is unfair and inequitable, then all the committee reports on earth will not justify it. Then permit me to demonstrate to you beyond all doubt that it is not a fair and equitable bill. As I proceed with the discussion, it will become apparent that there are abundant personal reasons why the committee should be unanimously in favor of this bill; but the question will gradually form in your mind, to use a slang expression, "Where do the rest of us get off?"

I wish during the course of my remarks to refer to two charts or tables of figures that I have compiled and prepared for the purpose of more forcibly calling to the attention of the members of this House the unfair and inequitable character of this bill.

I now call your attention to the large chart displayed before the Speaker's desk, marked "Chart A."

CUSHMAN'S CHART A.

Total appropriated and authorized in this bill for the 28 States and 3 Territories not represented on committee $8,095,357.08

The following 11 States and 3 Territories received no appropriation under this bill: Colorado, Idaho, Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, Nevada, North Dakota, South Dakota, Utah, Wyoming, Montana, Arizona, Oklahoma, New Mexico.

Total amount carried by this bill	$59,935,415.32
Amount appropriated in above 17 States (including 3 items not chargeable to any separate State)	51,400,657.44
The amount remaining to be divided between 28 States and 4 Territories not represented with membership on River and Harbor Committee	8,534,757.88

*Amounts included under head of Ohio River.

The slightest glance at that chart will show you that it has taken a vast deal of labor and study to go through this great bill and tabulate these figures. Here is a bill carrying nearly $60,000,000, divided between 408 different projects, and scattered from one end of the country to the other. It has been an enormous task to go through this monster bill and dig out these figures. I state this fact not in order to magnify my own labors, but to excuse a few errors which are contained in the chart. It is practically impossible to deal with such a vast mass of figures and not have a few errors creep into the compilation. I have discovered a few small ones since the chart was completed, and it may be that there are a few more that have escaped my attention. This much I state in order to be perfectly fair with the members of the House in the presentation of this matter.

But, having admitted this much, I will now say that the chart before you is substantially correct, and that no man can point out a sufficient number of errors to change in any material degree the facts and conclusions arrived at by a glance at this chart. It was not with any desire to criticise the members of the River and Harbor Committee that I began the compilation of these figures, but merely to ascertain the facts in relation to this bill.

Gentlemen will observe that this chart is prepared for the purpose of making a comparison—a rather startling comparison it proved to be—between the share of this bill which the members of the River and Harbor Committee have appropriated to their own States and the share which they have bestowed upon the rest of the country. You will notice that in the first column are named the 17 States, each one of which States has one member on the River and Harbor Committee—Ohio, Illinois, West Virginia, Michigan, Pennsylvania, Minnesota, New York, Oregon, Massachusetts, Wisconsin, Mississippi, Georgia, Alabama, Arkansas, Kentucky, Florida, and Texas.

Now, this bill contains two different kinds or items of appropriations. First, cash items, that are immediately available; second, certain sums or amounts pledged or authorized for the continuance in the future of the projects contained in this bill. The amounts which are authorized are in every sense appropriations, just as much as the cash items. The amounts which we authorize in this bill we are bound in honor to appropriate in future bills as the sum shall be needed. Now, in the first column, opposite the name of the State, I have placed the total of the cash items which this bill appropriates to that State; in the second column, opposite each State, I have placed the total of all the items which this bill authorizes for that State. Thus the two sums opposite the State of Ohio added together show the total sum appropriated and authorized which this bill provides for projects in Ohio, to-wit, $6,056,300.

The next State, being Illinois, shows a cash appropriation of $450,000, and $245,000 authorized, making the total amount appropriated in this bill for Illinois $695,000. The third State is West Virginia. There are no appropriations in this bill to be expended within the State of West Virginia, but there are a number along the Ohio River where West Virginia borders on that river. As all the appropriations for the Ohio River are included in my chart under the head of "The State of Ohio," it was not proper to include the same amounts a second time opposite the name of West Virginia; hence the blank opposite this State.

Now, so much for a general explanation of the nature of this chart. Permit me to call your attention specifically to some of the enormous amounts which some of these States have received in this bill. First, there is the State of Ohio, which receives under this bill the enormous amount of $6,056,300; the entire bill carries practically $60,000,000, therefore the State of Ohio receives more than one-tenth of the entire amount in this bill. There is the State of Michigan, which receives the largest amount of any State, a total of $7,668,000, or more than one-tenth of the entire amount carried by this bill. The State of Oregon receives $2,330,500, and the State of Massachusetts the sum of $4,805,696.37. You will observe that these States to which I have called your attention, as well as others in this column of States too numerous to mention, have received far more than their fair share of this $60,000,000.

In order to show you exactly how much more than their share they have received, let me pass to the bottom of the chart, to the total, where you will observe that these 17 States receive under this bill a total of $38,955,657.44. The three items, the "Mississippi River," the "Missouri River," and "Examinations and surveys," are not properly chargeable to any separate State. The total of these three items is $12,445,000. Add this item to the $38,955,657.44, and it produces the sum of $51,400,657.44. Now, if you subtract this last amount from the whole amount carried by this bill—$59,935,415.32—the remainder is $8,534,757.88, which is the amount left to be divided among all the remaining States!

Now, then, to get down to the meat in the cocoanut, in substance what do these figures show? They show that the members of this committee have appropriated to their own States nearly $39,000,000, and given to the other 28 States $8,500,000. Can any man look those figures in the face and justify this action?

Mr. BROMWELL. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BROMWELL. I see that the gentleman, in this chart, has a large amount charged up to the State of Ohio—charged, I presume, to the district represented by the chairman of the committee. I would like to inquire what items the gentleman has included in that amount. Does he include the amounts appropriated for the various dams and other improvements on the Ohio River?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROMWELL. Does the gentleman mean to say that the chairman of this committee is directly interested in any of the dams on the Ohio River when he represents a Cleveland district, situated on the lake, while the city of Cincinnati profits more perhaps than any other city unless it be Louisville——

Mr. CUSHMAN. If the gentleman has a question to ask, let him ask it.

Mr. BROMWELL. I am asking a question. I ask whether you can charge those improvements to the chairman of this committee when the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky, Tennessee, Mississippi, and every other State along the Ohio and Mississippi rivers get the benefit of those improvements? Is it fair to charge those to the chairman of the committee?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Look at the chart. I have not charged them to the chairman of the committee, but to the State of Ohio.

Mr. BROMWELL. Well, is it fair to charge them to the State of Ohio when all these other States get the benefit of them?

Mr. CUSHMAN. I will say to the gentleman that this printed slip or statement which I now hold in my hand was issued by the River and Harbor Committee. I got this statement from that committee; and in this statement these improvements were placed under the head of "Ohio."

Mr. BROMWELL. The Ohio River?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Oh, no; under the head of the State of Ohio. And if the committee had not placed these sums under the head of the State of Ohio I would have segregated that sum, as I did in the case of the Mississippi and the Missouri rivers. This committee by its own action is estopped from blaming me for charging the Ohio River improvements to the State of Ohio, for it was their own statement that caused me so to do. Now, then, does any man on this floor think that the State of Ohio is entitled to over one-tenth of this whole bill?

Mr. MANN. Can the gentleman inform us how much of those $6,000,000 is for the Ohio River?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Yes, sir. About $600,000 for the Ohio River.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman is mistaken in his figures.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I have simply added together the items, and I believe they are absolutely correct—certainly very nearly so, at any rate.

Mr. BROMWELL. May I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROMWELL. I shall not make any speech.

Mr. CUSHMAN. With that happy understanding, I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BROMWELL. In making up these figures, did the gentleman think it was fair to charge those amounts which are for the improvement of the Ohio River entirely to the State of Ohio, ignoring the fact that the State of Kentucky, on the other side of the river——

Mr. CUSHMAN. I know which side of the river Kentucky is on. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROMWELL. I say, does the gentleman think it is fair to charge those amounts which are for the improvement of the Ohio River entirely to the State of Ohio, ignoring the fact that Kentucky, the State of West Virginia, and the State of Pennsylvania all three participate in the benefits of this improvement of the Ohio River? Is it fair to say to the State of Ohio that the amounts which you have there should be charged solely to that State?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Before answering the gentleman, I would say that I am perfectly willing to answer any and all questions in this discussion that I can; but if my time is consumed in answering too many questions I may be obliged to ask the House for the courtesy of more time. Now, then, I answered that question for the gentleman just a moment ago. I said that the statement of these amounts are simply the figures which the River and Harbor Committee gave me, and in their statement they had them charged to the State of Ohio. I did not do that. I took my statement from what I got from the committee. I hold their statement in my hand now, and the appropriations for the Ohio River are included in this statement under the head of the State of Ohio. My figures in this chart are predicated on the figures put forth by the committee. I do not care to change my figures till they change theirs. However, I will say that nothing would please me better than to have the committee change the figures of this entire bill.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman permit just one interruption?

Mr. CUSHMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. WHEELER. Supplementing the gentleman's statement, I desire to say that the lock and dam improvements on the Ohio River above the city of Cincinnati inure practically to the State of Ohio and not to the State of Kentucky, and he is right in charging those amounts to the State of Ohio, because Kentucky receives practically no benefit from any improvement above the city of Cincinnati. It is not the wish of the people of Kentucky that it should be so improved.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Exactly. I thank the gentleman from Kentucky for additional testimony tending to show that this chart is fair.

Now, I should like to call the attention of this House to the State of Michigan, a State for which appropriations are made in this bill amounting to $2,153,000, and amounts authorized for over five and a half millions of dollars, making a total of $7,668,000 for the State of Michigan in this bill.

Mr. BISHOP. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BISHOP. Have you studied the figures to ascertain that more than $6,000,000 of that was for the great waterway between Lake Superior and Lake Erie, that is not chargeable to Michigan any more than to the rest of the Northwestern States?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Yes, sir; I have. And I have also studied the reports of this committee relating to the improvement of harbors in my own State that are at one end of a "great waterway" between the East and the West—improvements that are for the benefit of the mighty commerce between the Occident and the Orient—and I find that your committee has overlooked them like a "white check." [Great laughter.] That is a slang expression, the meaning of which I am not familiar with. I am glad to note, however, that its meaning does not seem to be lost on this great legislative body. [Laughter.]

Mr. BISHOP. We have not overlooked a single item regarding the State of Washington, and I wish to say that this very appropriation for Michigan carries with it the improvement of a waterway that opens up a pathway for commerce from the Pacific to the Atlantic Ocean, over which your commerce goes, as well as that of Michigan. [Applause.]

Mr. CUSHMAN. I know that the gentleman from Michigan is one of the greatest beneficiaries of this bill, and therefore one of its most eloquent advocates. Perhaps if my State drew seven and a half million dollars instead of one hundred and thirty thousand, then I might become selfishly eloquent for this bill, too. I call the attention of the members of this House to one significant fact: Every time a criticism is made of the enormous amount received by Michigan the gentleman begins to explain that the bulk of these appropriations are for a "great national waterway."

I will show the gentleman in a few minutes a map of the State of Michigan, to which he can call attention if he desires. It shows his own Congressional district, with six counties bordering on the lake front, none of which lie along that "great waterway." And the gentleman has got one appropriation in this bill for every county in his district that fronts on the lake. [Laughter and applause.] I appreciate the fact that the State of Michigan does lie along one of the great highways of commerce, but the trouble with you gentlemen is that you are trying to throw sand in the eyes of this House. Every time a man rises and criticises any feature of this bill you leap to your feet and claim that it is for the improvement of a great maritime highway. Do you think the only maritime highway on earth is located in the neighborhood of Michigan?

Mr. BISHOP. You asked me a question, and I claim the right to answer it. Take the harbor of Ludington, in my district. It has 2,400,000 tonnage. Nine-tenths of that tonnage comes from the great Northwest, and crosses Lake Michigan, and passes on to the East. It is no more for the benefit of Ludington than it is for the State of Iowa or the State of Minnesota, and much of that commerce is from your own State of Washington in carrying grain to the East.

Mr. CUSHMAN. That does not answer my question. The gentleman says that his city has a tonnage of about two and a half million, and it gets a large appropriation in this bill. I represent cities on Puget Sound having a tonnage of about 6,000,000, and they get the "measly" sum of $130,000.

Mr. BISHOP. There is not a port in your State that has that amount of tonnage, and the gentleman ought to know it.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I have here among my papers statistics which I will attach to my remarks showing that Puget Sound, of which Tacoma, Wash., is the greatest shipping point, is to-day the tenth seaport district in the United States, measured by exports and imports. And, by the way, while I was looking over this volume of commercial statistics I did not find the village of Ludington mentioned at all. [Laughter.] Tacoma is to-day the most distinctively American port of any ocean port in the United States. It carries the largest percentage of its foreign trade in American ships.

It has grown more rapidly than any other American port. The exports of Puget Sound have increased from $3,184,000 in the year 1885 to $15,200,000 in 1899. During this time the exports of the port of San Francisco have decreased from $38,155,000 to $30,214,000, and the exports from Huron, Mich.—Michigan, the State located along the great national waterway—has decreased since 1890 from $10,447,000 to $7,099,000. The exports from Cuyahoga, Ohio, in 1899 were only $2,175,000, or about one-fifth the amount exported from Tacoma in the same year. Talk to me about this Committee on Rivers and Harbors being guided solely by the amount of commerce a port possesses in the amount of appropriation they make for it! With the exception of New York and Boston harbors, there is not a dollar appropriated in this bill for any other seaport city as important in amount or growth in trade or the limitless possibilities of the future as the harbor of Tacoma and the entire Puget Sound region. [Applause.]

Mr. BISHOP. Is not the gentleman's city of Tacoma receiving money from the River and Harbor Committee now for the improvement of Tacoma's harbor?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Oh, yes. In this bill, Mr. Chairman, a bill that carries $60,000,000, a bill that improves the creeks and sloughs and frog ponds of the nation, some of which can not be found on the latest and largest edition of the Rand-McNally Atlas, and my State, one of the great maritime States of the nation, gets the ridiculous sum of $130,000! If you think my vote can be bought for that price in support of a bill carrying $60,000,000, you are away off your base. I come from a State filled with thoroughbreds! [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BISHOP. I understand fully what the gentleman's price is, and the House will understand that.

Mr. CUSHMAN. There can be no mistake about what your price was, because that is written in black and white in this bill.

Mr. BISHOP. I desire to say——

Mr. CUSHMAN. If you have anything you "desire to say," get a little of your own time in which to "say" it. The gentleman was making his speech yesterday, and I call the attention of this House now to the fact that three times I arose to ask him a question, but he was so busy talking about "beloved Michigan" and her "great waterway" that he could not see me. Now he wants me to continually recognize him. If you want to make a speech, get a little time of your own. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to refer once more to this chart (Chart A) and to the appropriations shown by it. Perhaps I had better pass from the total appropriation made for these 17 States having a membership on the River and Harbor Committee to the 28 States and 4 Territories not represented on that committee—and that is passing from the gigantic to the diminutive, from the colossal to the microscopic, from the proud to the pathetic! [Laughter.] Now, then, out of this gigantic sum of $60,000,000 carried by this bill the States and Territories which are unrepresented on this committee get the pitiful sum of $8,000,000 to be spread and splattered over 28 States and 4 Territories of this Union. Does any man on earth think that is fair?

Now, these are the figures. If these figures are false, I invite any or all the members of the River and Harbor Committee to point out the error. [A pause.] Now, then, if these figures are correct, then the River and Harbor Committee stands convicted of gross selfishness toward their own particular interests and gross unfairness toward the interests of the rest of the United States.

Now, then, that I have shown this fact substantiated by these figures, no member on this floor can vote for this bill and excuse himself by saying that its unfairness was not pointed out. It has been pointed out. The only question now remaining is whether after it has been pointed out the members of this House will carelessly ignore it, or willfully become parties to a measure so unfair that it borders closely on fraud.

If we first by our silence and second by our votes sanction this measure which gives four-fifths of the appropriations of the entire bill to the committee, in the next bill they will be encouraged to take it all. The only difference between this bill and a bill for the sole benefit of the committee is a difference not in principle, but in degree, and a very small degree at that.

The gentleman rose in his seat on yesterday and claimed that I was endeavoring to malign the committee. Ah, Mr. Chairman, I am not endeavoring to malign the committee or impugn the integrity of its members. The gentleman's conscience must have been hurting him when he said that by the compilation of these figures the committee was being maligned. Those are not my figures. They are yours. I did not create those figures. I merely compiled them. Neither am I responsible for the result at the bottom of the chart. I am not responsible for the mathematical fact that 2 and 2 makes 4. I merely added together the items which your committee created, and if there is anything in the result that hurts your conscience, that is your misfortune and not my fault. The thing that seems to be worrying some of the members of this committee is not that they have done something wrong or unfair—but that they have been found out.

Mr. Chairman, I invite this House to critically examine that chart. This chart is what I term a composite photograph of the 17 friends that I have on the River and Harbor Committee. [Laughter.] If the members of this House will look at this likeness closely, they will notice that the bump of selfishness is abnormally developed and that the line of generosity is completely obliterated. [Laughter.] Nineteen centuries ago imperial Cæsar said that "All Gaul was divided into three parts." He was an ancient, provincial, untutored ignoramus! If he could have lived to witness the dawn of the twentieth century and gazed upon the handiwork of the members of the River and Harbor Committee of the Fifty-sixth Congress, he would have amended that statement on his own motion and subdivided "all gall" into parts enough so that there would have been at least one fragment for each of the gentlemen on the River and Harbor Committee. [Great laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman has called attention to the fact that the States represented by the members on the River and Harbor Committee receive a very large proportion of the appropriations made by the committee. May it not be possible that the members of the committee are from the larger and more important coast and river and harbor towns and cities, and from the localities which have the best claim upon the Government for appropriations in the river and harbor bill?

A MEMBER. That is a fact.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I am very glad the gentleman from Wyoming asked that question. It will enable me to knock the pins out from under the only defense that yet remains for the River and Harbor Committee. Every time a criticism is made of any of the provisions of the river and harbor bill some beneficiary of the bill leaps to his feet and says that he represents some great maritime district entitled to more than ordinary consideration. Now, then, there is one test that is supreme and final, and that no man can say is unfair—that is the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army. All of these improvements are made directly under his supervision and direction and with his recommendation.

Whenever the Chief of Engineers of the Army is by act or joint resolution of Congress ordered to make a survey, estimate, and report on any proposed improvement, in his report on the project he includes not only the estimated cost of the project, but makes a review of the commerce of the locality intended to be improved, and makes that a part of the basis of his report. Now, then, if we were to take the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers for this year, covering every proposition in the United States, we would have a right to expect that the River and Harbor Committee would appropriate a certain proportion of what he recommended, and that that proportion of what he recommended would be uniform throughout the United States. That is, if in their own States they appropriated for themselves 75 per cent of what the Chief of Engineers recommended and gave to the rest of the United States only 50 per cent, that would be unimpeachable evidence either of selfishness or fraud. Neither would it be any answer to that charge for any man to say that his district was a great maritime district, because the Chief of Engineers took that, as well as other matters, into consideration when making the report.

I took the last report of the Chief of Engineers of the Army, and at the expense of a great deal of hard labor went over it from start to finish to find out the amount he had recommended should be appropriated in every State in the Union this year. And another object I had in going over his report was to find out what per cent of his recommendations the members of this committee had taken for their own States, and also what per cent of his recommendations they had given us, the other 28 States not represented on their committee.

I now call your attention to Chart B, which is now displayed before the Speaker's desk.

There, Mr. Chairman, is the X-ray turned on this river and harbor bill, and the result is anything but flattering to the members of that committee.

This second chart is somewhat similar to the first one in that it is divided into two sides, one side representing these 17 States, and the other side representing the rest of the United States. But Chart A shows the amounts appropriated and authorized in the several States. This chart (B) is designed to make a comparison between the amounts appropriated and the amounts not authorized but recommended by the Chief of Engineers. For instance, I have taken the 17 States represented by membership on the River and Harbor Committee and placed them in the first column. In the second column opposite each State is written the amount of cash appropriation this bill carries for that State. In the third column is written the amount of cash which the Chief of Engineers recommended should be appropriated for all the various projects in that State in this bill.

CUSHMAN'S CHART B.

Seventeen States with members on River and Harbor Committee.

States.	Amount appropriated.	Amount recommended.
Ohio	$1,814,300.00	$1,484,600.00
Illinois	450,000.00	1,502,000.00
West Virginia*	.....	.....
Michigan	2,153,000.00	1,490,200.00
Pennsylvania	953,000.00	397,000.00
Minnesota	210,000.00	.....
New York	1,854,859.50	2,461,500.00
Oregon	830,500.00	1,163,500.00
Massachusetts	1,486,201.00	1,552,720.00
Wisconsin	599,200.00	455,900.00
Mississippi	94,000.00	663,000.00
Georgia	450,700.00	323,500.00
Alabama	790,000.00	873,676.00
Arkansas	434,000.00	177,000.00
Kentucky	130,000.00	281,000.00
Florida	468,500.00	1,224,200.00
Texas	1,530,000.00	1,280,000.00
Total	14,238,260.50	15,309,796.00

Items recommended in three of above States which are not segregated:

Florida and Alabama	$38,000.00
Georgia and Alabama	565,000.00
Georgia and Florida	422,500.00
	1,025,500.00
	15,309,796.00
	1,025,500.00
Total amount recommended in 17 States	16,335,296.00
Total amount appropriated in 17 States	14,238,260.50

In these 17 States the amount appropriated is equal to 0.864 per cent of the amount which was recommended to be appropriated. Seventeen States receive 0.864 per cent.

*Amounts included under head of Ohio River.

Twenty-eight States and three Territories with no members on the River and Harbor Committee.

States.	Amount appropriated.	Amount recommended.
Maine	$155,500.00	$237,000.00
New Hampshire	50,000.00	50,000.00
Vermont	43,000.00	47,300.00
Rhode Island	165,700.00	555,484.00
Connecticut	188,000.00	302,178.50
New Jersey	348,000.00	199,000.00
Delaware	12,000.00	295,300.00
Maryland	147,350.00	662,452.00
Virginia	343,600.00	598,570.00
North Carolina	223,900.00	314,000.00
South Carolina	155,200.00	714,000.00
Louisiana	728,000.00	433,500.00
Tennessee	477,500.00	1,879,500.00
Indiana	50,000.00	63,000.00
Missouri	20,000.00	15,000.00
California	133,000.00	486,000.00
Washington	190,000.00	668,000.00
Montana	.....	2,000.00
Total	3,390,750.00	7,532,284.00

Total amount recommended to be appropriated in the 28 States and 3 Territories not having members on River and Harbor Committee $7,532,284.00
Total amount appropriated in said States 3,390,750.00

In these 28 States and 4 Territories the amount appropriated is equal to 0.467 per cent of the amount which was recommended to be appropriated. Twenty-eight States and 3 Territories receive 0.467 per cent.
Eleven States and 3 Territories receive no appropriation whatever.

The size of every appropriation bill is such that there can never be in all instances the full amount appropriated that is recommended. It is necessary always to reduce the amount appropriated below what was recommended. Now, then, look at this chart. First, there is Ohio; the amount appropriated, $1,814,300, is about $330,000 more than was recommended. Michigan, you will observe, got nearly a million dollars more than was recommended. Wisconsin receives about $140,000 more than was recommended. Arkansas gets about $257,000 more than was recommended; while all the remainder of the 17 States receive a very large proportion of the amount recommended. By taking the total at the bottom I find that the total amount which the Engineer recommended for expenditure in these 17 States was $16,335,296, and that the amount which this bill has appropriated in cash on these recommendations is $14,238,260.50; or in other words, they appropriated for themselves about 86½ per cent; and by consulting the other half of this Chart B you will observe that the States which were not represented on this committee only received about 46½ per cent of the amount which was recommended for them.

Now, then, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say in reference to my Chart A that it only proved a presumptive case of fraud or selfishness; but there is no way of getting around the facts disclosed by this Chart B. There is no way of justifying this unfair discrimination between these two localities. The equities and the claims of each locality were weighed carefully by the Engineer, and there can be no lame logic evolved from any muddy mind that will justify this wide discrimination between the States represented and those unrepresented. Can any man look that chart in the face and then tell me that this bill was framed solely with the idea of meeting the commercial and maritime needs of the nation? I tell you that this bill was not framed so much with a view to meeting the commercial and maritime needs of this nation as it was to meeting the personal and political needs of the members of the River and Harbor Committee. I invite the members of that committee to go up against the frozen face of that chart and then tell me—— [Great laughter.] Chart B forms an indictment that is not open to demurrer!

Mr. TONGUE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Certainly.

Mr. TONGUE. I see the gentleman has Oregon down for a recommendation of an appropriation by the Chief of Engineers of $830,000, and that the cash appropriation is over a million of dollars.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Ah, you have got the figures wrong. The gentleman from Oregon is not quite as handy with his eye as with his tongue. [Great laughter and applause.] Mr. Chairman, in this matter I have no desire to create any fun. It may be a laughing matter to some, but it is no laughing matter to the people which I, in part, represent on this floor. There is no man on this committee or on the floor of this House who can look those figures in the face and then arise in his place and attempt to tell this House that this committee was not influenced by some other motives than those shown upon the surface. It is a very significant fact that, taking all of the States represented by membership on this committee, they get 86½ per cent of what was recommended and the rest of us get 46½ per cent of what was recommended.

Mr. TONGUE. Now, the gentleman has got through with his laugh at my expense, I would like him to kindly answer my question.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. TONGUE. I asked you to state what appropriations there were for the State of Oregon.

Mr. CUSHMAN. The cash appropriation in this bill for the State of Oregon is $830,000. There is also a million and a half authorized in addition to this cash appropriation.

Mr. TONGUE. For what improvements?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mostly, my friend, for the mouth of the Columbia River.

Mr. TONGUE. I will ask if that river is not the boundary line between the States of Washington and Oregon?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Oh, if the gentleman will content himself for a moment I will show you a separate chart of that region, and explain it very thoroughly and his connection with it.

Mr. TONGUE. If the gentleman will kindly answer my question I will content myself.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I will answer that in a moment. I have another chart for your especial benefit [Laughter.] Now, then, before I leave Chart B for something else, I want to say that I fully realized that some gentleman might be able to pick flaws in Chart A because by reason of its very nature it could not be conclusive of unfairness, as there was no way of showing by Chart A which localities were deserving of the greatest consideration. The first chart, therefore, is not nearly so conclusive as the second one.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Certainly, with pleasure.

Mr. MANN. I supposed the gentleman's statement in reference to Illinois and the amount of the recommendation, $1,502,000, had been taken from the Chief of Engineers' report.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. There was a report of the Chief of Engineers recommending $10,000,000, and that probably is the case in many other instances.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Ah, I will answer the gentleman: I hold in my hand the annual report of the Chief of Engineers. That $10,000,000 recommendation is not contained in this volume. I went down to the office of the Chief of Engineers, having this volume in my hand, and asked the Chief of Engineers to be shown any subsequent recommendations made by his office. He showed me some, but there was no $10,000,000 item for Illinois. I failed to find the item the gentleman speaks of.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt the gentleman failed to find it, because I have no doubt if he had found it he would have incorporated it in his report. The truth about it is the Engineer did make a report covering a recommendation of $10,000,000.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Not desiring to impugn the gentleman's veracity, for he is a warm friend of mine, I will say that I believe that he is mistaken. The trouble is that many gentlemen confuse the two terms "estimate" and "recommendation." The Chief of Engineers frequently makes an estimate of what a proposition will cost, but makes no recommendation one way or the other. In this connection permit me to call the attention of this House to the fact that on yesterday I arose in my seat when the chairman of this great committee was addressing this House and asked him whether or not the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army had made a recommendation for the expenditure of $600,000 for the harbor of Cleveland, Ohio. That gentleman very suavely informed me that the Chief of Engineers had so recommended, and passed me a report. When I read it I found it was one I had read before, and that it did not contain the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers. I then telegraphed to the Chief of Engineers to find out whether he had recommended it or not, and found out that he had not. Is my statement denied?

Mr. BISHOP. Now, then, I have no doubt the gentleman wants to be entirely fair, and therefore would be pleased to have me suggest any errors in his figures.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Yes; it may be that in my haste I have not included all the items that Michigan received. [Laughter.]

Mr. BISHOP. Take the State of Michigan, and you have the cash appropriation as $2,153,000 and the amount recommended by the Chief of Engineers as $1,490,200. I wish to say to the gentleman that there was recommended by the Chief of Engineers, I think, in the neighborhood of $6,000,000, and for Limekiln Crossing alone $3,000,000, making $9,000,000 recommended by the Chief of Engineers that is not on that chart.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I am indebted to the gentleman from Michigan for calling this to my attention. A few moments ago, when I referred to the great appropriation received by the State of Michigan, the gentleman objected to that entire amount being charged to Michigan, because, he said, it was not for the benefit of Michigan, but for the benefit of a great national maritime highway. Now, then, that there is an opportunity for him to make a point by changing his position, he rises and objects because I have not incorporated in my table under the head of Michigan some other amounts recommended by the Chief of Engineers. By the gentleman's own statement a moment ago, in the hearing of this entire House, I ought not to have charged it to Michigan, because the gentleman said it was for the improvement of a great national maritime highway, and ought not to be charged to the State. That is what you said a moment ago. You had better go and get yourself straightened out till you know "where you are at." [Laughter.]

Mr. BISHOP. The gentleman can not by his wit nor the force of his voice drown the fact before this committee that his figures as to what was recommended by the Chief of Engineers is more than $10,000,000 less than what was recommended. Therefore the figures are wrong from beginning to end.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I call the attention of the members of this House that there is now contained in the record of this debate the language of my friend from Michigan in which he objected a few moments ago to my charging the State of Michigan with the appropriations which were made in that State because he said they were properly chargeable to this great maritime highway. Now he wants me to include in my chart, under the head of Michigan, all the amounts the engineer recommended for this same highway, because this would leave his case in a better condition. The gentleman can not be first on one side of the fence and then on the other.

Mr. BISHOP. Either the gentleman from Washington must change the figures in his first column, the amount appropriated, or else he must add nine millions in the other.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Now, when the gentleman gets himself firmly located either on one side or the other of that maritime highway I will come back and discuss the matter with him. At present I must move on in this debate.

Now, then, I want to call the attention of the members to the map of the State of Ohio. [See page 838.]

I am willing to concede that the State of Ohio is a great and an important State; but I am not willing to concede that the commerce and the rivers and harbors of the State of Ohio entitle her to one-tenth of the amount of this entire bill.

When I was a child, Mr. Chairman, I was taught by my teachers that the great maritime and shipping States of this nation lay along the seacoast and not in the center of the continent. [Laughter.]

Since I have examined the items of appropriation contained in this bill I am convinced of the error of my early training. The farther a State lies from the coast line or from salt water the greater is the appropriation contained in this bill.

Look at that map. Is the State of Ohio so located and so situated with reference to shipping interests that it deserves to receive over $6,000,000, or over one-tenth of the entire river and harbor bill? A river and harbor bill that was prepared for 45 great States, bounded by salt water on three sides and by the lakes on the north, and yet one-tenth of the bill is expended on the State of Ohio—a little, inland, cornfield State with 200 miles of lake front and one navigable river!

Yes, my early geographical training was certainly at fault. In view of the enormous appropriations made in this bill for this "seaboard" State of Ohio, if I were called upon now to give the boundaries of that cornfield Commonwealth I would say:

The State of Ohio: Bounded on the east by the Atlantic Ocean; bounded on the west by the Pacific Ocean; bounded on the south by the Gulf of Mexico; bounded on the north by the Great Lakes and the chairman of the River and Harbor Committee.

I call the attention of the members of this House to the fact that when the chairman of this committee [Mr. BURTON] was addressing the House the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. WILSON] asked him if the Committee on Rivers and Harbors followed the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers as nearly as they could in various cases, and particularly in the case of the project of building a ship railway along the Columbia River at The Dalles, Oregon, and in which we are interested. "Oh, no," the chairman said, "after he had read the report of the engineer it sounded to him like one of the dreams of Jules Verne."

Now, when we object to some of the appropriations in Ohio they rise up in holy horror and say, "Why, this is recommended by the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army." And when we call their attention to a favorable recommendation by the same Engineer's office to a project in our State, they say, "Oh, that sounds like one of the dreams of Jules Verne." [Laughter.] Now, the question I want to ask the worthy chairman of this committee is, At what particular geographical point between his State and my State does the report of the Chief of Engineers lose its reliability? [Laughter and applause.]

Now, then, we are getting around toward home base. [Laughter.] Here we have the map of Michigan—"beloved Michigan"—that is represented on the River and Harbor Committee, and out of a total of $60,000,000 she draws over seven and a half millions. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BISHOP] has been talking to us a great deal about that great maritime national highway "that runs between the two lakes." I want to call your attention to the fact that here is the map of his own Congressional district. It is not located anywhere near that great highway. There are six counties in his district bordering on the lake front, and he has got a river and harbor appropriation for every one of them in this bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. BISHOP. But the harbors are all there.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Exactly. The gentleman says "the harbors are all there." Did the gentleman ever examine the map of the State of Washington? "The harbors are there," too! [Great laughter and applause.]

Mr. BISHOP. There is more commerce in that one district alone, passing across that State, than there is in the entire State of Washington.

Mr. CUSHMAN. If the gentleman has never been outside of Michigan but a few times I can not blame him for that statement. A few moments ago the gentleman stated that Ludington, the port of Ludington, furnished an outlet for a large portion of the grain from the State of Washington. Mr. Chairman, from the window of my home I can look out over that matchless inland sea, Puget Sound, where I have seen gathered the flags of all nations, and from whose gateway goes forth the great ships to Hongkong, Hawaii, Melbourne, Balarat, Bombay, Alaska, the coast of Russia, Liverpool, London, and every other seaport on earth, carrying the mighty products of that State.

Now, do you see that flyspeck on the map of Michigan? That represents the maritime village of Ludington. Does any sane man on earth suppose that that lake port is of any great importance to my State or the Northwest? The gentleman has, unintentionally no doubt, magnified the commerce of the place. But I call attention further to the fact that in that one Congressional district, which is not located on this maritime highway, is appropriated $437,000, or three times as much as for the entire State of Washington. When anyone rises to criticise any of these propositions they immediately say it is "meritorious." When I looked in the dictionary for the definition of that term I did not find that its meaning was limited to the State of Michigan. That word applies to the entire universe; and there are rivers and harbors in other localities that are just as "meritorious" as those of Michigan.

Now, the same thing is true regarding the State of Florida. In one Congressional district in that State there are fifteen propositions for river and harbor improvements, each one of which receives an appropriation under this bill, and there is at least one river appropriated for that can not be found on the latest and largest edition of the Rand-McNally Atlas. Oh, yes; this bill makes appropriations for Peace Creek, and Raccoon Creek, and Buttermilk Channel, but it ignores many of the great maritime highways of the United States.

Now, I desire to exhibit to this House another map, and I ask not only the attention of the entire House, but particularly the attention of the gentleman from Oregon. [See page 841.]

The amounts in dollars set in the middle of each State is the amount which each of these States receives under this appropriation bill. One of these four States has a member on the River and Harbor Committee. Gentlemen, if you were called upon to hazard a guess as to which one of these States is represented on this committee, which one would you guess? [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. I would guess Idaho!

Mr. CUSHMAN. Yes; almost anybody would! Here are the Pacific coast States—California, $350,000; Idaho, nothing; Washington, $130,000, and Oregon with $2,330,500. The State of Oregon has a member on this committee, and I have no doubt that the propositions in that State are considered by the gentleman interested to be particularly "meritorious." But I want to call your attention now particularly to the Columbia River.

Mr. Chairman, this map shows "Where rolls the mighty Oregon and hears no sound save the expenditure of appropriations at his mouth." That is not the exact language of the poet of old, but it is vastly more expressive of the present condition in this locality.

Perhaps the most important proposed improvement in the entire United States which comes within the domain of the river and harbor bill is the proposed construction of a portage road on the Upper Columbia River around the rapids near The Dalles and Celilo.

When the daring navigator of the Pacific first anchored his craft in the mouth of the Columbia he knew from the mighty volume of water that poured forth that that stream found its source in the heart of the continent. No stream in the United States outside the Mississippi Valley system reaches such a vast area of country.

You can see by consulting this map that this stream flows directly through the great wheat region of the State of Washington, the fields that this year produced 25,000,000 bushels of wheat. The Columbia River, with its sister streams, the Snake, the Clearwater, and the Okanogan, reach the vast region of agricultural and mineral wealth that lies in eastern Washington, eastern Oregon, and Idaho.

For fifty years it has been the dream of the farmers of that region to be able to ship their wheat by water transportation (the cheapest in the world) to market. At present, by reason of certain impassable rapids on this river at The Dalles, they have been unable to do so. For the past twenty-five years every oily-tongued politician and demagogue who has gone into that country hunting for votes has proclaimed to those people that the next Republican Congress was going to make them an appropriation to remove or circumvent those rapids.

Then, after the campaign was over, nothing was done till the next campaign, and then the same delusive song was sung to an industrious and trusting people. I made that promise in the last campaign, and God knows I believed I had ample ground on which to make it. When next I campaign over that region I will not furnish those people with any select assortment of sugar-coated political fibs about why that appropriation was not made. I will give them the blunt, unvarnished truth—that the Republican majority of the River and Harbor Committee of the Fifty-sixth Congress appropriated $60,000,000, some of it for streams that can not be found on the latest edition of the largest atlas, and turned down a proposition for the improvement of the mighty Columbia,

At the present time the farmers of this region are just as far from market, for all practicable purposes, as if they had no market between them and Chicago. The only way they can now move their wheat is by rail. The railroad companies charge nearly as much to haul a bushel of wheat 300 miles west to the Pacific as they charge to haul it 2,000 miles east to Chicago. When the Columbia River shall be opened to navigation it will add 10 cents a bushel to the value of every bushel of wheat tributary to this mighty river.

Now, then, there was a balance of $220,000 appropriated and available for the construction of a ship canal at The Dalles. If a ship canal or a ship railway is not feasible, then we can build a portage road. There is no "Jules Verne dream" about that.

Now, then, this committee not only refuse to make any additional appropriation for the improvement of the rapids at The Dalles, but they repeal and take away from us the $220,000 which we now have and which might be used for some good purpose at this point.

Years and years ago I found in the Good Book a sentence which read: "From him who hath not shall be taken even that which he hath." For thirty years I have marveled as to just what that sentence meant. I never understood until I read this bill exactly how you could take something away from a person who had nothing. Since reading this bill the mystic meaning of that sentence has been fully revealed to me. [Laughter.]

The appropriations on the Columbia River have always been made up to the present time at the mouth of the river—between the city of Portland and the mouth. The chief appropriations, I say, have been made there. Now, I wish to call the attention of this House to one or two items of appropriation that have been made on the Columbia River. In the first place there has been expended between the city of Portland and the mouth of the Columbia River (on the Willamette and the Columbia) at one time $160,000; $155,000 at another time; and this bill increases the former appropriations by a cash appropriation of $830,000.

I will attach to my remarks a table showing the amount of appropriations made at various times for the Willamette River between Portland and the Columbia, and from their junction for improvements on the Columbia to the sea. This table will show that the amounts heretofore appropriated for the mouth of the Columbia River equals $2,225,680. The increased amount proposed in this bill for the mouth of the Columbia is $1,900,000, which will make $4,125,680 for the mouth of the Columbia; besides this gigantic sum, $1,330,365 in addition thereto has been spent on the rivers Willamette and Columbia between Portland and the mouth of the Columbia. This makes a total, including amount proposed in this bill, of $5,456,045, that has been, and will be, expended merely for the benefit of one city—the city of Portland. The city of Portland has 100,000 inhabitants. That makes $54.50 for every man, woman, and baby in the entire city, that has been expended trying to keep a channel from salt water up to that town. It would be cheaper for the Government to move the town and the people to salt water. [Laughter.]

The Chief of Engineers of the United States Army has made some statements regarding the expenditures at the mouth of the Columbia. When they started in spending money at the mouth of the Columbia River they had 31 feet of water. After they had spent three-quarters of a million dollars they took another sounding and then they had 28 feet of water. Then they spent a million and three-quarters more, and now they have 24 feet of water. The question now resolves itself into one of arithmetical proportion. If we have spent over $5,000,000 between the city of Portland and the sea to produce a deep channel and we have 7 feet less water now than we had when we started, how much water will we have when we have spent $5,000,000 more?

The gentleman from Oregon said to me that the reason Oregon received so much in this bill and the State of Washington so little was that the State of Washington had been well taken care of with appropriations on the river and harbor bill in the past. I looked this matter up and I find that up to the present time all the appropriations made for the State of Washington make the sum of $1,823,350, and the State of Oregon, that has been neglected in the past, got $9,558,435! [Laughter.] I will append to my remarks a little table showing that the same States which are the chief beneficiaries of this bill are the same States that in times past have received the greatest appropriations.

The total appropriations received by the State of Oregon for rivers and harbors to date is $9,558,350. But of this vast sum the only items that have been expended for the benefit of the Upper Columbia at and above The Dalles are as follows:

Total improvement of Upper Columbia and Snake rivers to date	$289,279
Total expenditure at The Dalles Rapids	28,000
Total appropriation for Clearwater, Idaho	50,000
Total	367,279

That is what they have spent on the Upper Columbia, Mr. Chairman, and the entire balance of that $9,558,435 has been expended in other parts of the State.

The total expenditure to date on the locks and canal at the Cascades on the Columbia River has been $3,748,000. But, Mr. Speaker, that project is only about 50 miles below these impassable rapids at The Dalles, Oreg. This Government never intended to spend three and three-fourths millions of dollars to make 50 miles of that river navigable. This improvement at The Dalles was one of the links in the chain and the canal at the Cascades was another link, and when they abandon the proposition at The Dalles, as they are trying to do, they render useless and worthless, almost, the vast expenditure of money at the Cascades.

Now, all over the State of Oregon we find appropriations made for various places. The Coquille River and Tillamook Harbor, The Long Tom, the Coos River, and the Clatskanie, and a lot of other appropriations for creeks and sloughs that were never heard of before by any man outside of Oregon. For instance the Coquille gets $40,000, $10,000 more than Tacoma, one of the greatest ports on the Pacific Ocean. This is only a sample of the remainder.

Gentlemen have said they must be guided to a certain extent by the recommendation made by the Chief of Engineers. I make the statement on the floor of this House that in one locality in the State of Oregon they got 140 per cent of what was recommended. [Laughter.] I am perfectly willing to have anybody deny that statement if it is not true. [A pause.] I will attach to my remarks a table of figures showing this fact as well as others relating to Oregon.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. I understood there was a project which was recommended by a former Congress and an appropriation provided which would have made possible the navigation of the Snake and the Upper Columbia, thereby giving the people of Idaho, Washington, and the adjacent States some benefit of the great appropriations that have been made at the mouth of the river. What did the committee do with that project?

Mr. CUSHMAN. That is the very project that I spoke about a few minutes ago, which is the improvement we have for twenty-five years been trying to get around the rapids at The Dalles, Oreg., that is between Washington and Oregon. Up to the present time practically all this money has been spent between Portland and the sea, and benefits Portland only, because the river above Portland is absolutely impassable. The people who reside above these rapids have to ship their grain down to Portland by rail. Knowing that this improvement at The Dalles had been recommended by the Chief of Engineers and also recommended by a former Congress and appropriated for, I had supposed that this committee would take care of the project in this bill, but when we come on the floor of this House the chairman of the committee says it sounds like one of the dreams of Jules Verne.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. CUSHMAN. With very great pleasure. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman will go a little further back into the record of the appropriations made by Congress, I think he will modify his statement in regard to the failure to make any appropriations for the Columbia River above the city of Portland, or not above the city of Portland, which is not on the Columbia, but on the Willamette River.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Perhaps I spoke more broadly than I intended when I said that little or no appropriations had been made above Portland on the Columbia. What I meant to say was that no appropriations of any decent amounts had been made for the Upper Columbia; and by the Upper Columbia we mean that portion of the Columbia above the rapids at The Dalles.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And furthermore, I think the gentleman will find quite large appropriations made on the Willamette River to promote the navigation up into the very valley about which the gentleman has been talking, and as high up perhaps as the Salem, in the State of Oregon. Furthermore, the gentleman will find large appropriations which were expended, with what result I can not state——

Mr. CUSHMAN. Now, I would advise you to print that speech in the RECORD. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have some pride in the former history of this committee, and I am trying to suggest to you——

Mr. CUSHMAN. Well, I have some pride in this speech I am making, and you are destroying it. [Great laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. You will find very large appropriations for The Dalles. I guess they did not do any good, but a large amount of money was expended.

Mr. CUSHMAN. The Chairman has advised me that I have only two or three minutes yet remaining. Now, I wish to say in conclusion——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the gentleman wants any more time I ask unanimous consent that he have half an hour.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I do not think I need consume that amount of time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. As much time as you want.

Mr. CUSHMAN. This House has been very indulgent with me, and I do not wish to tire them or tire myself, for that matter. I have not been long out of the sick bed, and I am very tired myself. I think I can conclude within a moment or two.

I have simply called attention to these various matters because it seemed to me that this bill was unfair. I have not intended during the course of these hasty and disconnected remarks to say aught that would in any way reflect upon the honor or integrity of any member of this great committee. They are seventeen honorable gentlemen, and I am proud to call them all my friends. Not one of them has in this matter been in any degree dishonest, or intended so to be. Indeed, I do not believe they have intended to be unfair. They have, in common with us all, that spirit of undying loyalty to the interests of their own homes and their own constituencies. They have seen with clearer vision the necessity for the improvements in their own particular States than they have the projects that lie in States outside their own.

Now, in the State of Washington—and I only refer to that because I am more familiar with the projects there—the people have been trying for years and years to procure the building of a ship canal joining the waters of Puget Sound with Lakes Union and Washington. This project was thoroughly examined and surveyed. It received the recommendation of the engineers of the United States Army, and Congress made one appropriation of $175,000 for the commencement of this great work. But heretofore no work could be done and none of this money spent because the right of way had not been secured. This right of way has just been secured and the title perfected by the people of Seattle and King County, and by them deeded to the Federal Government and the grant accepted by the Government. Those people have put in five or six years of time and expended a great deal of money procuring that right of way.

They are now ready to begin work in earnest. We ask that this bill provide an appropriation for that great project, the Seattle Ship Canal. I was informed by some of the gentlemen on this committee that they did not deem it advisable to make additional appropriations for the Seattle Ship Canal because there was $170,000 available for that project that has not yet been expended. How far will $170,000 go on a project the estimates of which run to $3,000,000? Now, if it is not the policy of this committee to make additional appropriations where a certain amount of money remains unexpended I want to inquire why this bill appropriates for the mouth of the Columbia River $400,000 when there is a fund of $256,000 to the credit of that project and now unexpended?

Why is it in Florida, on the Anclote River, they appropriate $9,000 when there is already $2,415 on hand?

Mr. LANDIS. What river is that?

Mr. CUSHMAN. The "Anclote" River. I never heard of it before, and I do not blame the gentleman if he never heard of it. I have in my hand a list of a dozen or more projects, showing where this committee has made additional appropriations in cases where money was still on hand to the credit of the projects which could be expended. I will add that list to my remarks. It made no difference to this committee when they desired to appropriate money that there was an unexpended appropriation on hand; but when they do not want to appropriate money they hold up their hands and say, "Why, you already have money to the credit of this project which you have not expended." I have noticed throughout this entire bill that the course pursued by the committee is not regulated by any fixed set of rules, but regulated, apparently, by the locality of the project under consideration.

We also want an appropriation for the inner channel at Grays Harbor, in my State, and will present an amendment asking for that. We want an increase over the amount now contained in this bill for Tacoma Harbor. We want an appropriation for the Seattle Ship Canal. We want an appropriation for the Olympia and Grays Harbor project. We want the clause of this bill which repeals and turns back into the United States Treasury the $220,000 at The Dalles stricken out and an additional appropriation made there, so navigation can circumvent those rapids. We want a larger sum for the Whatcom Creek waterway. All these things and more, too numerous to mention, we want. And if they were all conceded to us we would not then have our just share of this great bill, carrying as it does $60,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, I have not intended to present this matter in a selfish light in voicing the needs of my own State. I have only referred to that because it is a matter that comes nearer home to me than anything else in the bill. That is only natural. As long as I remain a member of this body and retain a seat on this floor there will never be framed a river and harbor bill that will have my voice and vote that carries $60,000,000 and gives to my State $130,000.

THE STATE OF WASHINGTON.

I have devoted a portion of my remarks to showing the unfair treatment of the State of Washington in this bill. The State of Washington, whose shores are washed by 3,000 miles of salt sea, indented with the most matchless harbors on earth; the State of Washington, peopled with the best and bravest branch of the Anglo-Saxon race; the people who braved the terrors of the savage and the wilderness and blazed the pathway of Christian civilization across the continent; the people who have erected splendid cities where once was naught but a wigwam in a wilderness; who have builded up a mighty Commonwealth out of the chaos of nature; the people who set the flag of our nation on the farthest outpost of the continent, where across the wide Pacific it waves "the greetings of the morning and the good-byes of the night" to the same blessed banner that floats above our boys in blue in the far-off islands of the sea; the people of the State of Washington that in the hour of war contributed what has been acknowledged to be the best and bravest regiment that set foot in the Philippines. And they watered its sands with their blood and they enriched its soil with their bones.

In all the splendid arts of peace, in all the sublime and heroic sacrifices of war, the people of the State of Washington have discharged every obligation due from a great and loyal State to a mighty and splendid nation. They have deserved better of their nation than their treatment in this bill. [Loud and continued applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having taken the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill and resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 5360. An act granting an increase of pension to Hiram I. Hoyt; and

Senate concurrent resolution 91:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed as a Senate document 15,000 copies of the hearings before the Senate and House Committees on Military Affairs on the Army bill (S. 4300), of which 5,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 10,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

SENATE BILL AND RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

S. 5360. An act granting an increase of pension to Hiram I. Hoyt—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Senate concurrent resolution 91:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed as a Senate document 15,000 copies of the hearings before the Senate and House Committees on Military Affairs on the Army bill (S. 4300), of which 5,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 10,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives—to the Committee on Printing.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. ALEXANDER] is recognized in his own right for one hour.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, the River and Harbor Committee has never been accused of allowing politics to enter into its deliberations, but it seems that we are guilty of sectionalism; that certain parts of the country directly represented by the committee are taken care of with great fidelity and other portions are avoided with care.

I do not know on what theory the Speaker selected members of the River and Harbor Committee, or why they are taken from certain States. Many changes have occurred in its personnel during the past four years, but few or no changes in the States represented. I recall that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MORRIS] took the place of Mr. TOWNE, of Minnesota, when the latter retired at the end of the Fifty-fourth Congress; that Mr. Barrett, of Massachusetts, was succeeded by Mr. LAWRENCE, of the same State; that Mr. Hermann, of Oregon, gave way to the present Representative from that State [Mr. TONGUE]; that when Judge Hooker, of New York, resigned as chairman of the committee, the present member from New York was appointed in his place; that Mr. Stevenson, of Michigan, was succeeded by Mr. BISHOP, of that State; and that when the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] was appointed chairman of a great and an important committee of this House, his place on this committee was taken by Mr. DAVIDSON, of the same State.

Has it been mere accident that these 17 States have continued to be represented on the River and Harbor Committee? I never made inquiry of the Speaker. I know nothing of his reasons for making these appointments, but it is a coincidence worthy of notice that these States represent the great bulk of the commerce of this country. Of our 159 harbors, 123 belong to these States, and a majority of the great rivers, the commerce bearers to ocean and Gulf. The greatest harbors of the country, with three exceptions, are represented upon this committee, viz: Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Savannah, Brunswick, Mobile, Galveston, Duluth, Chicago, Cleveland, and Buffalo, leaving only Baltimore, New Orleans, and San Francisco unrepresented.

Likewise the great rivers are represented; the Arkansas, the Ohio, the Upper Mississippi, the Lower Mississippi, the Warrior, the Trinity of Texas, and the great waterways flowing through Georgia and Alabama to the Atlantic and to the Gulf.

COMMITTEE STATES HAVE THREE-FOURTHS OF THE COMMERCE.

After the exhibit prepared by the gentleman from Washington was made public yesterday afternoon, I attempted to ascertain what proportion of the commerce of the country belonged to these 17 States.

The value of all exports and imports during the ten months ending October 31, 1900, amounted to $1,889,737,066. Of this amount, $1,445,414,000, or nearly 80 per cent, passed through the ports of the States represented by the members of the River and Harbor Committee. The total vessel tonnage, both steam and sail, engaged in the foreign trade of the United States during the year ending June 30, 1899, amounted to 52,376,792 tons.

Of this sum, only 15,000,000, or about 29 per cent, enter and clear from ports of the 28 States not represented on the River and Harbor Committee, while nearly 75 per cent of the tonnage of the country passed in and out of ports represented on the River and Harbor Committee. More than 80 per cent of all customs duties are paid at ports in these States. The total number of vessels, both steam and sail, engaged in foreign commerce and entering and clearing from the ports of the United States during the year ending June 30, 1899, was 64,202. Of this number, only 17,000, or 26 per cent, entered and cleared from ports within the States not represented upon this committee.

Thus it will be observed that an average of about 75 per cent of the commerce of the United States belongs to the States represented on this committee and that only about 25 per cent goes to the remaining 28 States.

Mr. Chairman, if you will now refer to the exhibit prepared by the gentleman from Washington, which sets up the appropriations given the 17 committee States on one side and those allotted to the 28 noncommittee States on the other, you will discover that they bear the ratio of about 75 to 25.

That is to say, the 17 committee States, which contain 75 per cent of the harbors and commerce-bearing rivers and control 75 per cent of the commerce, receive under this bill about 75 per cent of the total appropriation, while the 28 noncommittee States, which contain one-fourth of the harbors and control about one-fourth of the commerce, receive about one-fourth of the appropriations under this bill. I do not mean to say that the committee intended any such division. I do not know that anyone thought of it. The committee sought simply to do justice to and deal generously with each section of the country, having regard only to the demands of commerce; but it is certainly an approving coincidence that this bill should appropriate money so nearly in proportion to the actual commerce of the country.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, if the 17 members of this committee were selected from 17 of the 28 States not now represented on the committee, they would be compelled to make appropriations similar to those in the pending bill. It is not a question of individual preference. Where commerce is, where harbors are, where the great commerce-bearing rivers flow, there the money must be spent on improvements.

BUTTERMILK CHANNEL.

The gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN] good-naturedly and facetiously referred to Buttermilk Channel. The gentleman from Michigan did likewise, but in criticism of the committee's alleged methods of helping out local improvements. Buttermilk Channel will connect with the great water highway provided for New York Harbor in the last river and harbor bill. It passes in front of the wharves of Brooklyn from Gowanus Bay to Brooklyn Bridge. Here are the docks and elevators that assist in taking care of the tremendous volume of commerce entering Greater New York.

Of what use would be the proposed new channel, 2,000 feet wide and 40 feet deep, if vessels were unable to reach wharves after entering the bay? If a new outer channel is needed to admit the great boats—twelve, thirteen, and fifteen thousand tons burden—other interior channels are needed to take them through the upper harbor.

During the ten months ending October 31, 1900, the value of New York's exports and imports amounted to $893,176,394, much of which goes through Buttermilk Channel, while the total value of the tonnage of the 28 States not represented on this committee amounts to $444,321,738, or less than one-half, and yet the committee is criticised for appropriating $1,800,000 to deepen so important an arm of commerce as Buttermilk Channel.

OHIO'S APPROPRIATION.

Mr. Chairman, it is charged that the State of Ohio, the home of the chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, receives an undue proportion of the total appropriation carried by this bill. It appears at the head of the exhibit prepared by the gentleman from Washington, and seeks to carry the impression that Ohio is getting more than $6,000,000 of the $60,000,000 carried by the bill.

The questions asked the gentleman from the State of Washington have already punctured that bubble. The appropriations for Ohio, in fact and in truth, amount to little over $3,000,000. Where does the rest of it go? The Ohio River has $400,000, the dam at Culloms Ripple $1,050,000, and locks Nos. 8, 11, and 14, on the Upper Ohio represent $900,000, aggregating $2,350,000, which belong as much to West Virginia, Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois, and to every State bordering the Ohio and Lower Mississippi, as it belongs to Ohio.

Mr. BROMWELL. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Certainly.

Mr. BROMWELL. The gentleman speaks of an appropriation for Culloms Ripple as something over a million dollars. As a matter of fact this bill only appropriates $100,000 for acquiring the site.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; $100,000 is appropriated in the bill, and the deferred payments are $950,000.

Mr. BROMWELL. But the amount actually appropriated in this bill is only $100,000?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I asked the gentleman from Washington during his speech how much of the $6,000,000 which he scheduled as belonging to Ohio was chargeable to the Ohio River, and I understood him to say about $600,000. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York, in view of that statement, whether he is accurate about the figures he has given, and whether he will state how much of the $6,000,000 is chargeable to the Ohio River.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Two million three hundred and fifty thousand dollars is chargeable to the Ohio River, as follows: $400,000 cash to the Lower Ohio; $100,000 cash to the dam at Culloms Ripple, and $950,000 deferred payment; $150,000 cash at locks 8, 11, 14, and $750,000 deferred; making a total of $2,350,000.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman another question? Is this a matter about which there can be any difficulty in ascertaining the facts from the reading of the bill?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No difficulty whatever. All it requires is the reading of the bill.

Mr. MANN. There seems to be quite a difference of opinion between the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Washington; one says $600,000 and the other says $2,350,000. I wonder if all the statements are in equal proportion.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The exhibit of the gentleman from Washington indicated as much.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York whether it is not a fact that there is more commerce on the Ohio River than upon the Mississippi and Missouri rivers and their tributaries above the mouth of the Ohio River and all the rivers northwest of there to the Pacific Ocean?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think that is true.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I would like to know if the proportion of commerce carried on the Ohio River, compared with the Missouri and the Mississippi, is not due to the fact that Congress has given the Ohio more attention?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Well, that goes too far back in history; but I should say no. The Lower Mississippi has had more money expended on it, I should say, than any other stream in the United States. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] can answer that; he is an authority on that subject.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I speak especially of the Missouri. Speaking about the committee, I would like to ask if there is any member of the committee from any portion of the territory on the Missouri River?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I believe not. There is not much commerce on the Missouri, especially above Kansas City, while the commerce on the Ohio River runs up into millions of tons.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Yes; and if you did the same thing for the Missouri River, the same would be true of that stream.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I dare say you might improve it, but the commerce of the Ohio grows out of the great coal fields reached by it. These do not exist in the country watered by the Missouri River.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Corn and hogs and cattle have to be transported.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; that is true.

CLEVELAND'S BREAKWATER.

Mr. Chairman, I invite the attention of the committee for a moment to the breakwater at Cleveland, which makes up $2,800,000 of the appropriations for Ohio. No work on the Great Lakes is more necessary. It is demanded by the shipping interests of all the lakes as a harbor of refuge, if for nothing else. It is a matter of surprise that it has not been constructed before. If longer delayed, other members of the committee representing the Great Lake States would have been justified in insisting upon it, because a harbor of refuge at that point is absolutely essential.

Its importance has not been questioned by the committee, nor, so far as I have heard, by any member of this House. The chairman of this committee, who happens to hail from Cleveland, would be the last man to take advantage of his position to build up the interests of his home city. If censured at all, it ought to be on the ground of not asking for the breakwater before. He has been a member of this committee several terms. This is his second term as chairman, yet Cleveland has been the last to receive what all admit it has long needed. Such unselfishness is above the criticism of the gentleman from Michigan.

MICHIGAN'S SHARE.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's exhibit seeks to show that Michigan is given a larger share of the $60,000,000 than it would have obtained had that State been without a member on the committee; but Michigan and Ohio are alike in having charged up to them large appropriations for the general good. Michigan's harbors get less than $1,000,000—$986,000. The balance goes to the Detroit River, $500,000 cash and $1,250,000 deferred; $330,000 to the St. Clair Flats Canal; $500,000 cash and $4,000,000 deferred to the West Neebish Channel, between lakes Superior and Huron. There is not a sea captain, a vessel owner, an insurance man, in a word, no one interested in the commerce of the Great Lakes, who does not demand that these improvements be made. They help Michigan no more than New York. Every State is benefited because commerce is benefited.

Mr. BROMWELL. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROMWELL. It was stated by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER] that his State got no benefit from any of these dams which are being constructed in the Ohio River. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York whether it is not a fact, which the gentleman from Kentucky ought to have known, if he does not know, that the north bank of the Ohio River to low-water mark belongs to the State of Kentucky, and that every dollar appropriated for the dams on the Ohio River is practically an appropriation which ought to be charged to the State of Kentucky instead of the State of Ohio. Is not that a fact?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think nobody seriously questions that every dollar put into the Ohio River benefits Kentucky, West Virginia, Pennsylvania, Indiana, and Illinois just as much as it does Ohio. It is folly to quibble about that.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes, sir.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN] a few moments ago, in giving his figures from the estimates of the Chief of Engineers, quoted as the estimate for Massachusetts the figures which appear on the chart in front of us—$1,552,720. The other map calls for an appropriation of something over $4,000,000 for Massachusetts. Now, is it not a fact that the survey for the improvement of Boston Harbor, which makes up a great part of the money appropriated for Massachusetts, did not reach the committee until after Congress had assembled, so that it was impossible to have that estimate included in the present report of the Chief of Engineers?

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is right. The printed reports of the new projects did not reach the committee until they had been in session for at least two weeks; and some of them did not reach us until the bill was nearly completed.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. That being true, would it not greatly reduce the percentage of the amounts recommended by the Chief of Engineers and reported favorably by the River and Harbor Committee; and may not that explain the discrepancies in the exhibit before us?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I thought I would venture this matter because I noticed the discrepancy, and I thought it only fair that the attention of the House should be called to it.

Mr. BISHOP. I would like to ask a question. Is it not true that in column 2 of this exhibit, where $15,309,000 is stated as the amount recommended by the Chief of Engineers, that amount is more than $15,000,000 out of the way, because it leaves out the recommendation for Boston Harbor, the recommendation for Limekiln Crossing, the recommendation for St. Clair Flats, and the recommendation for West Neebish Channel, all of them new projects and making the sum total of $15,000,000.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes, that is right.

Mr. BISHOP. So that the figures of the gentleman from Washington are more than 100 per cent out of the way?

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is correct.

Mr. WHEELER. I did not hear the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. ALEXANDER] in reply to what I said about the improvement of the Ohio River above Cincinnati. I have been informed that the gentleman said it was folly to assert that Kentucky reaped no benefit from that improvement.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield to the gentleman. I did not go into the matter.

Mr. WHEELER. I want to put myself right on the record. I had no idea of conveying the impression that Kentucky reaped no benefit from this improvement. But I want to direct the gentleman's attention very briefly to three things which the River and Harbor Committee has been doing in reference to the improvement of Western waters. You have improved the Ohio River above Cincinnati, so that freight can go into Cincinnati; but it can not get out of there by the river; so that shippers are at the mercy of the railroads.

You have improved the Cumberland River above Nashville so that freight can go into Nashville but can not get out of it, being deadlocked by the Louisville and Nashville Railroad. You have improved the Tennessee River above Riverton so that freight can go through the mouth of the river. Every dollar that the River and Harbor Committee has expended upon those three rivers has been for all practical purposes thrown away—has been uselessly expended. This view, I will say to the gentleman, is held by the best informed river men on those three rivers.

Mr. ALEXANDER. You rose to ask a question, and you are making a speech.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I am perfectly willing to give you opportunity to ask a question, but not to make a speech.

Mr. WHEELER. I admit that I am trespassing upon the courtesy of the gentleman, but I was sure I could do so with impunity. I simply made the remark I did in order to repel the suggestion that Kentucky or any other State tributary to these rivers reaped any considerable benefit from improvements beginning at the sources of these rivers and not commencing at their mouths.

Mr. BROMWELL. If the gentleman from New York will allow me, in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, I wish to say the gentleman must surely know that the improvements of the Ohio River at the present time do not extend below Dam No. 6.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. BROMWELL. And that is away up in the neighborhood of Pittsburg.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; I understand that, but you must expend hundreds of thousands of dollars——

Mr. BROMWELL. Let me finish my sentence. The contemplated improvements of the Ohio River when ultimately concluded will provide for the navigation of that river at all times of the year, with a 6-foot stage of water from the city of Pittsburg to the city of Cairo. To-day Louisville and the other cities of your State are getting just as much benefit from the improvements in the Upper Ohio River as the city of Cincinnati is. Only 25 per cent of the coal that comes down the Ohio stops at Cincinnati. It goes to Louisville and on down the river, so that Cincinnati gets no benefit of these improvements that is not shared by other cities.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield further.

Mr. WHEELER. I hope my friend will permit me to make one other suggestion in reply to that.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield just for a moment.

Mr. WHEELER. I want to say to the gentleman that the engineer in charge of the Ohio River is responsible for the statement that it will be between fifty and seventy-five years before this scheme of improvement under contemplation can be carried to the mouth of the Ohio River, and he is also responsible for the statement that an expenditure of $150,000 between Cairo, Ill., and the mouth of the Tennessee River will open the Ohio River for navigation by the largest boats up to Evansville, Ind., 200 miles. Why should not that expenditure be made?

Mr. BROMWELL. I am not on the committee.

ERIE BASIN AT BUFFALO.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think we have given sufficient attention to the Ohio River. I want now to go to Buffalo. In the remarks of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] yesterday he said:

> Two years ago $50,000 was appropriated to make a survey of the Erie basin at Buffalo. The survey was made and an estimate submitted showing the probable expense of making the improvement desired by the local interests in this basin. The estimate was less than $200,000. I have the estimate before me. The money was appropriated—the entire amount mentioned in the estimate of the engineer.
> Now, we must assume that the engineers making these estimates in the first instance knew what they were doing. But I find in this bill, on page 12, an additional appropriation of $200,000 and an authorization of a continuing contract for $614,643 in addition, carrying altogether nearly a million dollars for a local improvement for the express benefit of local interests.

There is one grain of truth and three grains of error in that statement. First, $50,000 was not appropriated to make a survey of the Erie Basin at Buffalo. It was made under the general provisions for a survey and was so paid for; second, there was no estimate made last year; third, he did not have such an estimate before him. The gentleman has confused the north breakwater with Erie Basin and Black Rock Harbor. An appropriation of $248,000 was made to build that breakwater, but it had nothing whatever to do with Erie Basin. The grain of truth in his statement is that an appropriation of $200,000 cash and a continuing contract for $614,643 are made in this bill for the improvement of the channel entering Erie Basin and Black Rock Harbor.

BUFFALO VS. DETROIT.

I can well understand why the gentleman from Michigan might think this an unnecessary improvement and that Buffalo Harbor was sufficient without it. While he lives in a great, beautiful city, full of wealth, of energy, and of great resources, it is not a port of large water commerce. The October Summary of Commerce and Finance, prepared in the Bureau of Statistics, pages 930 to 933, shows that during the present navigation season Detroit shipped and received only 329,038 tons of freight, with 539,404 bushels of grain and 52,599,000 feet of lumber.

Buffalo gets more lumber every three weeks, more tons of freight every two weeks, and more grain every day in the week. The good people of Detroit see boats passing up and down their river in long processions, carrying freight to Cleveland and Buffalo in the East and to Chicago and other points in the West, but very little of it stops at the city of the gentleman from Michigan. Little harbor room, therefore, is needed. He can not understand the wants of a congested harbor. If one-quarter of the vessels that pass through the river were compelled to stop at Detroit and discharge and receive freight, the need of harbor facilities would be so manifest that the construction of wharfs and harbors would become for a time the great industry of that city.

But having no such home needs, the gentleman is unable to appreciate the necessities of a great and busy harbor.

BUFFALO'S GREAT HARBOR.

Mr. Chairman, Buffalo is the second port in extent of water commerce in the United States, and the fifth in the world. Greater New York is first; Buffalo is second. In the commerce of the world London is first, New York second, Liverpool third, Hamburg fourth, and Buffalo fifth. During the seven months of open navigation ending October 31 last its water commerce exceeded 4,000,000 tons, besides 116,000,000 bushels of grain and 371,000,000 feet of lumber. On an average, 30 steamers a day go in and out of its harbor.

It is not an uncommon sight to see a procession of seven, eight, or ten great vessels starting on their voyage up the lake and as many coming back. The harbor is everywhere and always congested. More room is absolutely necessary, and wherever wharf and elevator facilities can be secured, with sufficient depth of water to reach them, it is essential to the interests of its vast and ever-increasing commerce that the Government open up the necessary channels.

Erie Basin and Black Rock Harbor are in the very center of Buffalo's water front. At present the channel leading to this basin is from 14 to 22 feet deep and to Black Rock Harbor from 12 to 18 feet deep. It is proposed to deepen this channel to admit boats of 18 and 19 feet draft. The day of larger ships has come to the Great Lakes as well as to the ocean, and it is absolutely essential that channels from 21 to 23 feet should be afforded. This is the purpose of the proposed improvement of which the gentleman from Michigan complains. It is not a "local improvement" for "local interests."

It is not for the benefit of Buffalo, but for the accommodation of the commerce of the Great Lakes, in which every city and every State to the west of Buffalo is deeply interested. As well charge the enlargement of West Neebish Channel to Michigan, or the improvement of the Ohio River to the State bearing its name, as to charge that this channel is solely for Buffalo's benefit and "local interests."

The gentlemen from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] and from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN] should study the needs, the purposes, and the character of the improvements provided for in this bill before assuming the rôle of critic. Ignorance is, perhaps, pardonable, but public criticism of great public improvements based upon ignorance is reprehensible.

THE NIAGARA RIVER DAM.

The gentleman from Michigan wants to dam the Niagara, although it may overflow a portion of his colleague's [Mr. HENRY C. SMITH'S] district, and he attacks this bill because provision is not made to carry out the visionary scheme.

It may be that such a project will find favor in the far-off future, but not until it has been thoroughly considered by the greatest engineers of this Government and of Canada and pronounced to be without fault or blemish will it continue to command the serious attention of this committee. Section 4 of this bill authorizes the President, by diplomatic negotiations or otherwise, to enter into such agreements as will secure, as far as possible, the maintenance of suitable levels in the Great Lakes and connecting waters between the United States and Canada.

This does not refer especially to the scheme of the gentleman from Michigan. There are other waste waterways than the Niagara. But under this section all can be done and done wisely that there is any immediate need of accomplishing, and though the gentleman from Michigan may fret and criticise, the waters of the beautiful Niagara will continue to flow on unvexed by dams, bearing upon its bosom the commerce of the Tonawandas while speeding its way to its famous leap into the rapids and whirlpool below.

BUFFALO VS. CHICAGO.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I notice that the gentleman places the port of Buffalo as the second port in the country, and I have so much respect for the accuracy of the gentleman's figures that I wish to ask him a further question in regard to it. In my innocence I had always supposed that Chicago was the second port in the country, and I notice that by the last bulletin just issued by the Bureau of Statistics the entrances of vessels at Buffalo are placed at 3,684 and that at Chicago at 7,099 for the eleven months ending June 30 last. For that reason I ask the gentleman more particularly in reference to his figures concerning Buffalo.

Mr. ALEXANDER. If you will examine the last statement of the Treasury Department for the season ending December 31, 1900, you will see that Cleveland received 4,041,881 tons of freight in addition to its grain and its lumber. Chicago received 4,167,950 tons of freight additional to its grain and its lumber. Buffalo received 4,549,201 tons of freight additional to its grain and its lumber. Chicago has 478,000,000 feet of lumber, Cleveland 386,000,000 feet of lumber, Buffalo 371,000,000 feet of lumber. The time was when Buffalo was a larger lumber market than Chicago; but what it loses in lumber it more than makes up in grain.

Mr. MANN. Now, if the gentleman will pardon me——

Mr. ALEXANDER. Let me finish my answer.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Buffalo received 116,257,939 bushels of grain, Cleveland 3,476,905, and Chicago 67,841,992, or little more than one-half the amount of Buffalo.

	Tons.	Bushels.	Feet of lumber.
Buffalo	4,549,201	116,257,939	317,107,000
Cleveland	4,041,881	3,476,905	386,588,000
Chicago	4,167,950	67,841,992	478,314,000

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman a further question? You spoke of receipts; do you also include shipments?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Shipments and receipts.

Mr. MANN. I do not know where the gentleman got his figures in reference to Chicago, but they are incorrect.

Mr. ALEXANDER. They are taken from the October Summary of Commerce and Finance of the United States, prepared by the Bureau of Statistics. The gentleman can get it. It is found on pages 929 to 933.

Mr. MANN. The total tonnage and the vessels are very much the same between Buffalo and Chicago, and the vessels clearing Chicago are nearly twice as many as the gentleman says.

Mr. ALEXANDER. You have 10,464 vessels and Buffalo 5,754, according to the authority already cited.

Mr. MANN. We have twice as many vessels and the vessels are the same.

Mr. ALEXANDER. You have not twice as many.

Mr. MANN. Nearly twice as many.

Mr. ALEXANDER. No.

Mr. MANN. I will give the gentleman the figures for that. The entrances from Buffalo are 36,084, and Chicago 7,099.

Mr. ALEXANDER. You have got them wrong.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will find himself mistaken and still leave Buffalo the third port of the country.

Mr. ALEXANDER. You will find the figures correct as I give them. I have cited my authority. Buffalo is the second port in the United States.

Mr. Charles H. Keep, the secretary of the Buffalo Board of Trade, advises me that the latest available statistics respecting the commerce of Buffalo show that the registered vessels entering and clearing the port of Buffalo during the present season of navigation aggregate 11,825,000 tons, and that the freight received and shipped during the same time aggregates 12,115,000 tons. Owing to the prolonged anthracite coal strike, he adds, coal shipments have fallen off fully 1,000,000 tons below normal.

Mr. OTEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to make any objection to this bill. I have no objection to the improvement of Buttermilk Channel, Contentnea Creek, Winyah Bay, nor Wappoo Cut. I have no objection to the improvement of those familiar harbors of Ahnapee, Saugatuck, Menominee, Manitowoc, Kewaunee, and Tillamook. None whatever. They are familiar to every member of this Congress. I have no objection to the improvement of Powow River, Murderkill River, Tickfaw, and Big Sunflower. [Laughter.] But in looking over this bill I find that an important river—New River, Virginia—is not included. [Applause.]

I come before this House (while the appropriation has not been put in the bill and was not recommended by the engineer) to ask for the modest sum of $500,000 for that river; but, like the man and his wife who quarreled whether they should have canvasback duck or terrapin for dinner and compromised on cabbage, I will compromise on $5,000. [Laughter and applause.] This is a very important matter to the people of my district; and since the River and Harbor Committee have met, I bid them be of good cheer on their bill. I intend to vote for those 17 States that are represented on the River and Harbor Committee as well as the 28 States that are not, and especially for the appropriation to those States that get none. I come with a petition signed by some of the most distinguished gentlemen of the State of Virginia, among whom is the governor of the State, asking for this small sum of $5,000.

I am called away on account of sickness in my family, and therefore I will not be here to present the amendment myself, but I wish to call your attention to the importance of this measure. It is not, understand, any money for any additional improvement. It is simply to clean out and to repair the channel that has already been made, on which $112,000 has been already expended. There is a balance of $2,800 unexpended, and this means an appropriation of only $2,200. The amendment will be in the words as follows:

For cleaning out and repairing the deep channel made by the United States Government in New River, Virginia, $5,000.

In my absence that amendment will be presented by another gentleman; and I ask that such fair consideration be given to him as you have always so generously accorded to me. [Applause.]

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOPKINS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 13189, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 5117. An act granting a pension to Roland Burnett;

H. R. 10785. An act granting a pension to Thomas White;

H. R. 2752. An act granting an increase of pension to Edmund P. Tierney;

H. R. 13394. An act providing for the payment of electoral messengers;

H. R. 1734. An act granting a pension to Mary A. Whitmore;

H. R. 9108. An act granting a pension to Maria H. Hixson;

H. R. 5655. An act granting a pension to Lurinda Laughlin; and

H. R. 10062. An act granting an increase of pension to Harriet Crotsenberger.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled joint resolution of the following title:

S. R. 144. Joint resolution to fill a vacancy in the Board of Regents of Smithsonian Institution.

DEATH OF HON. FRANK G. CLARKE.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, the members of this House were startled this morning on taking up the daily paper to find the public announcement of the death, the sudden death, of another of its members. In the absence of his colleague it becomes my duty to make formal announcement to this House of the death of the Hon. FRANK G. CLARKE, a Representative from the Second district of the State of New Hampshire. His death occurred last evening at his own home in Peterboro, in that State.

Mr. Speaker, as a mark of our respect to his memory, I offer the following resolutions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut offers the following resolutions, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with deep regret and profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. FRANK G. CLARKE, late a Representative from the State of New Hampshire.

Resolved, That a committee of 16 members of the House, with such members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral at Peterboro, N. H., and that the necessary expenses attending the execution of this order be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for properly carrying out the provisions of this resolution.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following committee, provided for in the resolutions: Mr. SULLOWAY, Mr. HILL, Mr. KNOX, Mr. CAPRON, Mr. HOWELL, Mr. LANE, Mr. ALLEN of Maine, Mr. LANDIS, Mr. LITTLEFIELD, Mr. WEAVER, Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts, Mr. GRIGGS, Mr. GAINES, Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana, Mr. NAPHEN, and Mr. KING.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, as a further mark of respect to our deceased colleague, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to.

And accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Interior submitting an estimate of appropriation for deficiencies in appropriation for Department of the Interior—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

By Mr. WACHTER: Resolutions of the Naval Veterans of Maryland for the passage of Senate bill 3423—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. WILLIAM E. WILLIAMS: Papers to accompany House bill for the relief of Josiah Booker—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WILSON of Idaho: Protest of citizens of Boise, Idaho, against the establishment of the parcels-post system—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 11, 1901.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. SEWELL, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Journal will stand approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, yesterday when the vote was taken upon the amendment looking to the retirement of General Shafter with the rank of major-general I was necessarily detained from the Senate. Had I been present, I should have voted for the amendment.

DECORATIONS BY THE ITALIAN GOVERNMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of State, transmitting certain information relative to the desire of the Italian Government to bestow upon Dr. Eugene Wasdin, of the Marine-Hospital Service, the Cross of Officer of S. S. Maurizio e Lazzaro, and upon Dr. H. D. Geddings, of the Marine-Hospital Service, the Cross of Chevalier of the same order, in recognition of their services in verifying and confirming the Italian studies and discoveries in regard to the nature of yellow fever; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

LEGATION AT PEKIN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of State, transmitting a copy of a dispatch from the minister of the United States in China, Hon. E. H. Conger, on the proposed extension of the legation grounds at Pekin; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

ADAMS ISLAND DAM.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of State, together with a note from the British ambassador, touching the proposed construction by the government of the Dominion of Canada of a dam from Adams Island, in Canadian territory, to Les Galops Island, in United States territory, etc.; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

MOBILE BAY IMPROVEMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 9th instant, the report of Major Rossell, United States Engineers, on the survey and estimate for opening the outer bar at Mobile Bay; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

DISBURSEMENT OF PUBLIC MONEYS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Commissary-General of Subsistence, United States

Army, relative to the adoption of an amendment of section 285, Revised Statutes, which requires that every disbursement of public moneys or disposal of public stores made by disbursing officers pursuant to an order of any commanding officer of the Navy be allowed by the proper accounting officer of the Treasury, etc.; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CONSULATE AT BEIRUT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of State, transmitting a copy of dispatch No. 69, of November 26, 1900, from the consul at Beirut, relative to an increase in the compensation of the clerk in the consulate at that place; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ABNER D. LEWIS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting certified copies of the findings filed by the court in the cause of Abner D. Lewis vs. The United States; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SEWELL presented the petition of Rev. W. V. Louderbough and 200 other members of the Presbyterian Church of Salem, N. J., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors to native races in Africa; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented sundry petitions of citizens of Plainfield, Tennet, Elizabeth, Summit, and Haddonfield, all in the State of New Jersey, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. NELSON presented a petition of sundry citizens of Jackson County, Minn., praying for the enactment of the so-called Grout bill, to regulate the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented three petitions of citizens of Owatonna, Minn., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in Army canteens; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SIMON presented a petition of sundry citizens of Nehalem Bay, Oreg., praying that an appropriation be made for the improvement of the entrance to the Nehalem Bay and Harbor; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. McMILLAN presented a petition of the Central Trades Council of Bay City, Mich., praying for the enactment of legislation to regulate the hours of daily labor of workmen and mechanics, and also to protect free labor from prison competition; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented sundry petitions of citizens of Petoskey, Mich., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the house of representatives of the State of Michigan, favoring the enactment of the so-called Grout bill, to regulate the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine; which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. BURROWS presented the petition of George G. Smith and 48 other citizens of Washington, D. C., praying for the enactment of legislation to abolish the present system of street-car fenders used on cars in the city of Washington and in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. FAIRBANKS presented a petition of A. Cohen, S. F. Lancaster, and of the De Vend-Haya Shoe Company, all of Jeffersonville, in the State of Indiana, praying for the repeal of the duty on hides; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of D. C. Harter and 103 other citizens of Wabash County, Ind., praying for the enactment of the so-called Grout bill, to regulate the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. FRYE presented a petition of Meade Post, No. 40, Department of Maine, Grand Army of the Republic, of Eastport, Me., praying for the enactment of legislation giving preference to veterans in the public service; which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

He also presented petitions of Houghton Brothers and 86 other citizens of Bath, of Ara Cushman and 17 other citizens of Auburn, of George F. Smith and 18 other citizens of Searsport, of John Metcalf and 40 other citizens of Madison, of George Chandler and 34 other citizens of Livermore, and of C. E. Hovey and 13 other citizens of Waldoboro, all in the State of Maine, praying for the repeal of the stamp tax on bank checks; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the National Manufacturers' Association of the United States, praying for the ratification of the pending reciprocity treaty between the United States and France; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Maritime Association of the Port of New York, of New York City, praying that an appropriation be made for the extension and completion of the breakwater at Point Judith, Rhode Island; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the legislature of the State of California, praying for the passage of House bill No. 96, providing rules for governing the importation of trees, etc., and also for the inspection of trees, etc., which become subjects of commerce; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a memorial of Local Union No. 68, Coopers' International Union, American Federation of Labor, of Rochester, N. Y., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to prohibit the issuance of revenue stamps for eighths and sixths barrels of beer; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

NAVAL STATION IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. HALE. I present a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, inclosing a copy of the report of the board of which Rear-Admiral Frederick Rodgers, United States Navy, was president, appointed June 29, 1900, pursuant to the provision contained in the naval appropriation act of June 7, 1900, for the purpose of examining into the expediency of changing the location of the naval station now at Port Royal, S. C., to some point in the State of South Carolina at or near the city of Charleston. I move that the communication and accompanying report be printed as a document, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5230) for the suppression of train robbery in the Territories of the United States and elsewhere, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by himself on the 10th instant proposing to appropriate $125,000 to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to purchase Analostan Island, in the Potomac River, near the city of Washington, intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill, reported it favorably without amendment, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and printed; which was agreed to.

He also, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5119) granting a pension to Jessie A. Bruner, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5172) granting a pension to Elizabeth Bughman, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SPOONER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 953) to divide the State of West Virginia into two judicial districts, reported it without amendment.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. CARTER. I am directed by the Committee on the Census, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 12740) making an apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the Twelfth Census, to report it favorably without amendment.

In view of the urgent nature of this measure, I ask that it be read for the information of the Senate, and I desire unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read in full to the Senate for its information.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, will the Chair kindly hear me a moment? I thought the bill was being read for information. I am told it is read to be acted upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is being read for information.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am told that it is likely to give rise to some considerable debate. I therefore think I must object.

Mr. HALE. I do not think it will give rise to any debate whatever. We are all helping the Senator to pass his Army bill, and a measure of this kind, so important, the Senate certainly ought to have an opportunity to pass.

Mr. HAWLEY. Let it be read for information then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will continue the reading.

Mr. TELLER. I do not believe anyone in the Chamber knew what was going on. I suggest that the Secretary start anew and read from the beginning. It will take but a few moments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana, from the Committee on the Census, reported favorably the House apportionment bill and asks for its present consideration, and it was being read for the information of the Senate. The Secretary will again commence the reading of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That after the 3d day of March, 1903, the House of Representatives shall be composed of 386 members, to be apportioned among the several States as follows: Alabama, 9; Arkansas, 7; California, 8; Colorado, 3; Connecticut, 5; Delaware, 1; Florida, 3; Georgia, 11; Idaho, 1; Illinois, 25; Indiana, 13; Iowa, 11; Kansas, 8; Kentucky, 11; Louisiana, 7; Maine, 4; Maryland, 6; Massachusetts, 14; Michigan, 12; Minnesota, 9; Mississippi, 8; Missouri, 16; Montana, 1; Nebraska, 6; Nevada, 1; New Hampshire, 2; New Jersey, 10; New York, 37; North Carolina, 10; North Dakota, 2; Ohio, 21; Oregon, 2; Pennsylvania, 32; Rhode Island, 2; South Carolina, 7; South Dakota, 2; Tennessee, 10; Texas, 16; Utah, 1; Vermont, 2; Virginia, 10; Washington, 3; West Virginia, 5; Wisconsin, 11; and Wyoming, 1.

SEC. 2. That whenever a new State is admitted to the Union the Representative or Representatives assigned to it shall be in addition to the number 386.

SEC. 3. That in each State entitled under this apportionment, the number to which such State may be entitled in the Fifty-eighth and each subsequent Congress shall be elected by districts composed of contiguous and compact territory and containing as nearly as practicable an equal number of inhabitants. The said districts shall be equal to the number of the Representatives to which such State may be entitled in Congress, no one district electing more than one Representative.

SEC. 4. That in case of an increase in the number of Representatives which may be given to any State under this apportionment, such additional Representative or Representatives shall be elected by the State at large, and the other Representatives by the districts now prescribed by law until the legislature of such State, in the manner herein prescribed, shall redistrict such State; and if there be no increase in the number of Representatives from a State the Representatives thereof shall be elected from the districts now prescribed by law until such State be redistricted as herein prescribed by the legislature of said State; and if the number hereby provided for shall in any State be less than it was before the change hereby made, then the whole number to such State hereby provided for shall be elected at large, unless the legislatures of said States have provided or shall otherwise provide before the time fixed by law for the next election of Representatives therein.

SEC. 5. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, it seems to me that the bill had better go over in order that Senators may have an opportunity to look at it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama objects to the present consideration of the bill. It will go to the Calendar.

COURTS IN ARKANSAS.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 12395) to provide for the holding of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the eastern district of Arkansas, to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration. It is a bill of but two or three lines and changes the place of holding courts. I call the attention of the Senators from Arkansas to the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN FAULDS.

Mr. PROCTOR. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3047) to remove charge of desertion from military record of John Faulds, of Company G, Thirty-first Wisconsin Infantry, to report it favorably, without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration. It consists of only a few lines, and is a House bill to correct a military record.

The Secretary read the bill, and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BUTLER (by request) introduced a bill (S. 5533) for the relief of William C. Staples; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FORAKER introduced a bill (S. 5534) for the relief of Azor H. Nickerson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SEWELL introduced a bill (S. 5535) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of the claims of officers and enlisted men of the Army for loss of private property destroyed in the military service of the United States," approved March 3, 1885; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FAIRBANKS introduced a bill (S. 5536) granting an increase of pension to Thomas A. Owen; which read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CLAY (by request) introduced a bill (S. 5537) for the relief of Mrs. M. Emma Poche; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DANIEL introduced a bill (S. 5538) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. R. A. Bradshaw; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FORAKER introduced a bill (S. 5539) for the relief of Sophronia Atwood Paige; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MARTIN introduced a bill (S. 5540) for the relief of Alexander Perry; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5541) providing for the erection of a public building in the city of Charlottesville, Va.; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. SCOTT submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $6,000 for paving Fourth street east from U street north to W street, intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. FOSTER submitted an amendment providing for the protection of Mount Rainier National Park by authorizing a detail of troops for the purpose of guarding the same, and proposing to appropriate $20,000 for the improvement of said park, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

EVA BURRELL.

Mr. MCMILLAN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to Eva Burrell, widow of Henry Burrell, deceased, late a laborer in the employ of the Senate, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his demise, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

PETITION OF FILIPINOS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. TELLER, as follows:

Ordered, That the petition of certain inhabitants of the Philippine Islands, which has to-day been read in the Senate, be printed as a document, together with the names of the signers.

Mr. SPOONER. Has the Senator from Colorado any objection to the resolution going over until Monday? Some of us did not hear read the communication which it is proposed shall be printed, and for one I should like to read it.

Mr. TELLER. I have no objection to the resolution going over until Monday, if any Senator thinks it ought to go over, if it will come up in regular order on Monday, as it does to-day.

Mr. HALE. Retaining its place?

Mr. TELLER. Retaining its place, of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado asks unanimous consent that the resolution shall go over until a later day, retaining its place on the table—or retaining its present position?

Mr. TELLER. Its present position is what I want it to retain.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator wish it to go over subject to call, or to go over until next Monday?

Mr. TELLER. I want it to come up as the regular order of business on Monday next.

Mr. HALE. As morning business?

Mr. TELLER. As morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so understands. It is so ordered.

STATIONERY ROOM OF THE SENATE.

Mr. MORGAN. Are resolutions in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No, the order has been passed.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask leave, then, to offer a resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Chair will receive the Senator's resolution.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate shall have the control of the officers of the stationery room of the Senate so as to inquire into and, from time to time, to report upon the conduct thereof.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Senator from Alabama if this matter does not belong to the Committee on Rules rather than the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate?

Mr. MORGAN. The Committee on Rules is merely, I think, a philosophical, academic body. The Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate is known for its laborious service to the Senate, and so I prefer that committee.

Mr. HOAR. I did not hear the Senator. I think the Senator was paying some very high compliment to the Committee on Rules, and I wanted to hear it. I think he said it was a very philanthropic committee.

Mr. MORGAN. I was trying to compliment the Committee on Contingent Expenses over the shoulders of the Committee on Rules. That is what I am trying to do, but perhaps I failed to do it.

Mr. HALE. Let the resolution be read again.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. SPOONER. Let it go over until the next day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution goes over under the rule. Morning business is concluded.

THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Army bill.

There being no objection, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4300) to increase the efficiency of the military establishment of the United States.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am given to understand that section 31, page 43, is under consideration, an amendment proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs. I am instructed to withdraw that amendment.

Mr. HOAR. What section?

Mr. HAWLEY. Section 31, page 43. It relates to retiring officers on a higher grade and that sort of thing.

Mr. HOAR. In my copy page 43 begins with section 40.

Mr. HAWLEY. There is a new print.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators had better have the new print before them. The new print came in this morning.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is page 43, section 31, beginning in line 9. I am given to understand that the reprint has not been distributed.

Mr. TELLER. It is page 40 of the old print.

Mr. HAWLEY. There is no harm in looking at the old print, and Senators may see that particular section on page 40. In the reprint it is on page 43.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is impossible to hear the Senator.

Mr. HAWLEY. What is it, please?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is impossible to hear what the Senator requests.

Mr. HAWLEY. I said that the amendment in question can be found on page 40 of the original print, but we have had a reprint for convenience, and in the reprint it comes on page 43, beginning in line 9.

Mr. ALLISON. It is section 31 in all the prints.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is section 31, proposing to give additional grade upon retirement to certain classes of officers.

Mr. HALE. What does the Senator propose to do with the section?

Mr. HAWLEY. I am instructed by the committee to withdraw it.

Mr. ALLISON. Let it be voted down.

Mr. HALE. The Senator asks the Senate to agree to the section as in the original print of the bill?

Mr. HAWLEY. No; the section is an amendment.

Mr. HALE. The section is withdrawn?

Mr. HAWLEY. The section is withdrawn as the pending amendment, and that, I am authorized, I think, to say, also drops the pending amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], which was an amendment to section 31. He understands that that drops on withdrawing section 31.

Mr. HALE. How does it leave the provision?

Mr. SEWELL. There is nothing left in it whatever. It stands on the present law.

Mr. TELLER. I understand when that is withdrawn the amendment to it drops, as a matter of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can not be withdrawn. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the vote by which this section was agreed to may be reconsidered.

Mr. HAWLEY. Very good; I make that request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the reconsideration of the vote?

Mr. ALLISON. The section has not been agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. No; it has not been agreed to.

Mr. PROCTOR. It was passed over.

Mr. ALLISON. It was passed over. Therefore I suggest that it be rejected. That is the only proper way to act on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that it was not agreed to, but that it was passed over.

Mr. HAWLEY. I supposed that it was in a condition to be withdrawn.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be stricken out.

Mr. SEWELL. It was passed over at my suggestion last evening.

Mr. HAWLEY. Let it be rejected.

Mr. COCKRELL. It should be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If it is an amendment offered by the committee, and it was not considered and agreed to, it can be withdrawn by the committee.

Mr. SEWELL. That is the situation.

Mr. PROCTOR. That is the situation, as the committee understands it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee withdraws the amendment?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. HALE. Section 31 goes out.

Mr. HAWLEY. Section 31 goes out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the Senator from Colorado withdraws his amendment?

Mr. TELLER. I do if the section goes out, of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The section is out.

Mr. HAWLEY. There is nothing for it to hang on now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], which will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of the amendment, the following proviso:

Provided, That no further military force shall be used in the Philippine Islands, except such as may be necessary to keep order in places there now actually under the peaceable control of the United States and to protect persons or property to whom, in the judgment of the President, protection may be due from the United States, until the President shall have first proclaimed an amnesty for all political offenses committed against the United States in the Philippine Islands, and shall have, if in his power, agreed upon an armistice with persons now in hostility to the United States, and shall have invited such number, not less than ten, as he shall think desirable, of the leaders or representatives of the persons now hostile to the United States there to come to the United States and state their wishes and the condition, character, and wishes of the people of the Philippine Islands to the Executive and Congress, and shall have offered to secure to them safe conduct to come, abide, and return, and shall have provided at the public charge for the expenses of their transportation both ways and their stay in this country for a reasonable and sufficient time for such purpose.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. HOAR. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Committee on Military Affairs decided unfavorably upon this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to lay the amendment on the table, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. ELKINS. Let the amendment be read.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask that the amendment be read again for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again read.

The Secretary again read Mr. HOAR'S amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll on the motion to lay the amendment on the table.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULBERSON (when Mr. CHILTON'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. CHILTON] has a general pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS].

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. QUARLES]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. PROCTOR (when Mr. DILLINGHAM'S name was called). On this question my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. HEITFELD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. PLATT]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. MCMILLAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY], but I transfer that pair to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], and vote "yea."

Mr. MONEY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCBRIDE] who is absent. I do not know how he would vote if present, and therefore I withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PRITCHARD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MCLAURIN]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). On this vote I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER]. As I do not know how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MCMILLAN (after having voted in the affirmative). I find that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] is paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. So I will transfer my pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE], and let my vote stand.

Mr. MASON (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. SULLIVAN]. I am informed that he is not present. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I have been informed since I announced my pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] that a pair has been announced between him and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY]. I do not understand that, because the Senator from Rhode Island called on me the day before yesterday, stating that he was called away by unavoidable necessity, and asked me to pair with him for a week, which I agreed to do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCMILLAN] has just corrected that, and another pair has been announced.

Mr. VEST. Then, as I understand, my pair with the Senator from Rhode Island stands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is correct.

Mr. BACON (after having voted in the negative). I understand that the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE], with whom I am paired, is not present. I therefore withdraw my vote, as I have a general pair with that Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. QUARLES] is detained from the Senate by illness.

Mr. BURROWS. I inquire if the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. BURROWS. I am paired with that Senator, and will withhold my vote.

Mr. PROCTOR. I suggest that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY] might stand paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], who requested me to pair him on this matter, and the Senator from Michigan will be at liberty to vote.

Mr. BURROWS. I adopt that suggestion, and vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—32.

Allison,	Foraker,	Lodge,	Proctor,
Bard,	Foster,	McComas,	Scott,
Burrows,	Frye,	McCumber,	Sewell,
Carter,	Gallinger,	McMillan,	Shoup,

Bate,	Daniel,	Mallory,	Towne,
Berry,	Hale,	Pettigrew,	Turley,
Butler,	Harris,	Pettus,	Wellington.
Clay,	Hoar,	Rawlins,

NOT VOTING—35.

Aldrich,	Depew,	McEnery,	Sullivan,
Bacon,	Dillingham,	McLaurin,	Taliaferro,
Baker,	Elkins,	Martin,	Tillman,
Beveridge,	Heitfeld,	Mason,	Turner,
Caffery,	Jones, Nev.	Money,	Vest,
Chandler,	Kenney,	Penrose,	Warren,
Chilton,	Kyle,	Platt, N. Y.	Wetmore,
Culberson,	Lindsay,	Pritchard,	Wolcott.
Cullom,	McBride,	Quarles,

So Mr. HOAR'S amendment was laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment under consideration last night was misplaced in the list handed to the Chair. The Chair now lays it before the Senate. The Chair is of the impression that there was an amendment offered to the amendment by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW], the first part of which was withdrawn.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. What is the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It leaves before the Senate as the amendment stands what will be read to the Senate by the Secretary.

The Secretary read the amendment proposed by Mr. PETTIGREW, which was at the end of the bill to insert the following:

It is further provided, That one-third of the original vacancies created by this act, in all grades, from colonel down to second lieutenant, in both staff and line, shall be filled by selection from the officers of volunteers who have been commissioned in their respective staff corps or arm of service since April 21, 1898. The remaining two-thirds of original vacancies created by this act to be filled by selection from the officers of the Regular Army.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this amendment the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] was last evening occupying the floor.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I ask leave to offer an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask may lie upon the table for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from North Dakota will be received and laid upon the table. The question is, Will the Senate agree to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW]?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, it is well to consider for just one moment what that amendment would authorize. It provides that one-third of the vacancies in the line and staff shall be filled from the volunteers. It would authorize the appointment of colonels in the Engineer Corps, in the Adjutant-General's Corps, and in every other corps, of men who have only had a year or two years' service. It would also make a very strange mixing up if appointments were made, for instance, from the volunteers who held commissions in the Regular Army. There are lieutenants in the Regular Army serving as majors of volunteers, and if appointed, as they would expect to be under this provision, and have a right to ask to be appointed, they might come back into the Regular Army ranking hundreds of those who are now properly above them, and ought to remain so, and who have been in the service the same as they have. So it would result in endless confusion and the greatest possible injustice.

Mr. SEWELL. I will just add to what has been said by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] that our whole time in committee for weeks was given to carefully considering this bill and the disposition of the officers of the different classes. If you are to make a lump of the whole thing, you would do away with all our work and we should have to do it over again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] has asked for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BACON (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE], and withhold my vote on account of his absence.

Mr. BURROWS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY].

Mr. PROCTOR (when Mr. DILLINGHAM'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. PRITCHARD (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MCLAURIN], and withhold my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER]. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HEITFELD. I again announce my pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. CULBERSON. I am paired with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. QUARLES], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. BATE. I inquire whether the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DEBOE] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the Senator from Kentucky has not voted.

Mr. BATE. Then I will not vote, as I am paired with that Senator and do not know how he would vote if present.

Mr. MONEY. I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCBRIDE]. I do not know how he would vote if present, and therefore I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN. I will state that by arrangement the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] has been paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER], with whom I have a general pair. That leaves me at liberty to vote, and so I will let my vote in the negative stand.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Under the arrangement announced on the last vote of the transfer of my pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] I am at liberty to vote, and I vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN. I am informed that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. KENNEY] desires to stand paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], so I will make a change in the pair, and transfer my pair with the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER] to the Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW], and let my vote stand.

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—16.

Allen,	Clay,	Mallory,	Teller,
Berry,	Daniel,	Pettigrew,	Towne,
Butler,	Harris,	Rawlins,	Turley,
Clark,	Jones, Ark.	Taliaferro,	Wellington.

NAYS—33.

Allison,	Hale,	McMillan,	Shoup,
Bard,	Hanna,	Morgan,	Simon,
Carter,	Hansbrough,	Nelson,	Spooner,
Dolliver,	Hawley,	Perkins,	Stewart,
Fairbanks,	Hoar,	Pettus,	Thurston,
Foraker,	Kean,	Platt, Conn.	Warren.
Foster,	Lodge,	Proctor,
Frye,	McComas,	Scott,
Gallinger,	McCumber,	Sewell,

NOT VOTING—37.

Aldrich,	Culberson,	Lindsay,	Quarles,
Bacon,	Cullom,	McBride,	Sullivan,
Baker,	Deboe,	McEnery,	Tillman,
Bate,	Depew,	McLaurin,	Turner,
Beveridge,	Dillingham,	Martin,	Vest,
Burrows,	Elkins,	Mason,	Wetmore,
Caffery,	Heitfeld,	Money,	Wolcott.
Chandler,	Jones, Nev.	Penrose,
Chilton,	Kenney,	Platt, N. Y.
Cockrell,	Kyle,	Pritchard,

So the amendment of Mr. PETTIGREW was rejected.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I want to explain my vote on the previous roll call. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TALIAFERRO] and did not know that he was absent and had not voted when I cast my vote. I wish to have the RECORD corrected, so that it may appear that I voted inadvertently, not knowing that the Senator from Florida had not voted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair now lays before the Senate the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY]; which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 38, line 1, after the word "direct," it is proposed to insert the words "not exceeding the period of three years."

Mr. MONEY. I withdraw that amendment, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. DANIEL. On page 38, line 23, of the last edition of the bill, I move to amend after the words "grade of," by inserting the words "captain or."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 38, line 23, after the words "grade of," it is proposed to insert "captain or;" so as to read:

Volunteer officers who establish their fitness before these examining boards may be appointed to the grade of captain or first or second lieutenant in the Regular Army.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I appreciate the difficulty of defining the line of exact justice which should lie between appointments of volunteers and appointments of regular officers to positions in the Regular Army. I am well aware that there are such embarrassments in all directions on this subject that one may well respect the opinions of another, although he can not entirely coincide with them; but it seems to me that the amendment which I have suggested is a just and equitable one, and that, if no other changes were made, it would perhaps leave the matter in practically as just an attitude as we are able to place it.

I have scanned the departmental documents which have been submitted to us on this subject, and I find no recommendation from the Secretary of War and none from the President, but there is one from the Lieutenant-General Commanding the Army, a letter of his addressed to the Secretary of War, submitting the draft of a proposed bill for the reorganization of the Army, dated November 15, 1900. In that proposed scheme of regular organization, section 8 provides:

That all vacancies created or caused by the provisions of this act above the grade of captain in the line of the Army shall be filled by promotion according to seniority in the several arms.

So, I take it, Mr. President, that the amendment which I have offered would place this bill upon that plan which is favored by the present commanding officer of the Army, himself a regular officer of many years' standing, although he came into the Army through the volunteer service.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator will pardon the Chair, the Chair desires to call his attention to the fact that that portion of the section where he proposes to offer the amendment has been stricken from the bill. The Chair calls the Senator's attention to page 39, where he thinks the Senator would desire to offer his amendment.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I presumed that I had the last edition of this bill in my hand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has, but if the Senator will notice——

Mr. DANIEL. It is not noted as stricken out of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator to the large bracket in line 18, on page 38, and the bracket in line 18, on page 39. That entire portion has been stricken out.

Mr. DANIEL. I perceive the point now, sir, where the amendment should come in.

I now move to insert the word "captain" before the words "first or second lieutenant," in line 24, on page 39, of the last published edition of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is right.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator allow me to suggest that he will have to strike out the words "and captain" in line 12, on page 38?

Mr. DANIEL. There are several consequential amendments which would have to follow if this were adopted.

Mr. HARRIS. The language there is:

That vacancies in the grade of field officers and captain, created by this act, in the cavalry, artillery, and infantry shall be filled by promotion according to seniority in each branch, respectively.

Mr. DANIEL. I have noted that.

Mr. HARRIS. I think if the Senator would move to strike out the word "captain" there, it would cover the case.

Mr. DANIEL. I have noted—and that would follow as a consequential amendment—the words "and captain" in line 12, on page 38. I will make that motion, as it comes first and seems to be more precisely in line with the recommendation of the Lieutenant-General. I move to strike out the words "and captain" in line 12 of renumbered section 24, on page 38, and insert the words "captain or" in line 24, on page 39.

This, Mr. President, would give a reasonable opportunity for distinguished volunteer officers who have shown their fitness for command to have a commission in the Regular Army reasonably responsive to their merits.

I have but little to say on this subject, but I will call attention to what have been the services of the volunteers in the late war with Spain and in the Philippine imbroglio which resulted therefrom. On the 21st of April, 1898, there were 28,183 men in the Regular Army. On May 31 of that year no less than 125,000 volunteers had been mustered into the service—nearly five times as many volunteers as there were, just before that, of regulars. In August of that year the Regular Army had been increased to 56,365 men, and the Volunteer Army had been increased to 207,244. So in August of that year there were about four times as many volunteers as there were regulars.

The volunteer forces of that date were subsequently mustered out of the service. There was a new call for volunteers, which was also promptly responded to, and the Army of the United States now, as given by the Adjutant-General in his recent report, is composed of 2,535 regular officers, 63,861 enlisted men in the Regular Army, and 1,548 officers and 31,079 enlisted men in the Volunteer Army. I will ask permission to insert this statement of the Adjutant-General in my remarks without reading it to the Senate more fully.

The Hospital Corps is not included in the effective strength of the Army, nor counted as a part of the enlisted force provided by law.

The number of officers in the Regular Army holding volunteer commissions is deducted from aggregate strength to avoid counting twice.

Mr. President, let us see what has been the recent service of these two forces that constitute the military arm of the United States. As to their services in Cuba and in Porto Rico, it is not necessary to go into any detail. Enough to say that the volunteers at the battle of San Juan showed themselves to be good soldiers.

I might observe in this connection that nearly all the commanders of both regulars and volunteers in the late war or in the disturbances that have been consequent upon that war have been men who entered the Regular Army from the volunteer service of the United States. Miles and Brooke in Porto Rico, Shafter in Cuba, Otis and MacArthur in the Philippines, are all officers of the Regular Army who were educated in the best possible school of war; that is, on the battlefield.

Mr. MONEY. Major-General Swan, too.

Mr. DANIEL. Yes, sir; and many others might be mentioned.

Mr. MONEY. Lawton.

Mr. DANIEL. Yes; and I might observe, too, that of the most distinguished officers who have recently fallen in battle—Lawton, in the Philippines, and Liscum, in China—one of them went into the Regular Army from the Ninth Indiana Volunteers and the other from the First Vermont Volunteers; and whether you scan the conduct of the commanding officers who have led our troops in the late war or of the enlisted men upon the field, this at least, must be said of both classes, that the officers educated in the volunteer ranks of our forces and the men serving in the volunteer ranks of our forces have shown themselves to be in no respect inferior to those who have had the advantage of regular military education and who went through all grades in the Regular Army of the United States.

It is claimed that the regular officer has a prior lien upon vacancies arising in an increase of the Regular Army. To a certain degree it seems to me that the Regular Army officer is entitled to fair and full consideration. I would not in any respect disparage him, for it may be honestly and sincerely said of the Regular Army officers of this country that, as a rule and with rare exceptions, they are soldiers and gentlemen, well worthy to wear its uniform and to be trusted with its defense, and the good will of all citizens and of all legislators should attend them.

At the same time it must not be forgotten as to the Westpointers that they have from the beginning to the end of their distinctive military careers many advantages which should be accredited to their account. If you take a young man at 17 or 18 years of age and give him an education at Westpoint, he comes from that institution well prepared not only for military service, but for the combat of life in any way, shape, or form that it may assume. The fact that he has accepted an education at the hands of the Government, in which all of his expenses have been paid and peculiar advantages accorded to him, does not give him a high claim upon the Government in the race for any further advantages which may arise in the development of our national affairs. He has already been well paid for the time he consumes in preparing himself for its service.

At the end of his career, too, Mr. President, he has an advantage which does not come to the volunteer and one that only comes to a rare number of our countrymen. He has the knowledge in his mind throughout his service that when old age has crept on the Government will relieve him from duty before he has spent his length of days in the service and provide for him an easy method of retirement with a competence for the remainder of his life.

Now, in the interim, while he should receive such just promotions and acknowledgments of his services as may befit his ability and his distinction, he does not deserve to exclude from a fair share in the honors of military life those who have educated themselves upon the battlefield of the country, at the best school that war has ever had in any generation of men.

While I do not seek in this bill and would oppose any unjust discrimination against regular officers, so will I oppose any unjust discrimination against volunteer officers. And let it be said of the great mass of those who have enlisted in the volunteer service or have been commissioned in it that they have themselves contributed largely to the promotion and distinction of the regular officers. For of the twenty-five hundred and odd regular officers that we have upon the roll of the Regular Army, 233 are now holding volunteer commissions, the associates in volunteer regiments of the colonels, majors, captains, and lieutenants and men who are serving there. So the volunteer service has itself been an assistance to the regular service, even as the regular service has been a substantial educational assistance to it.

I have in my hand, Mr. President, an extract from the report of the Adjutant-General, made at the close of last year. The report is dated October 20, 1900, and the extract covers pages 35 to 63 thereof. It is a chronological list of actions and of losses in the Philippines from February 4, 1899, to June 30, 1900, inclusive. I shall not occupy the time of the Senate in reading the long list of battles, skirmishes, affairs, actions, combats, or whatever you may be pleased to call them, but I shall ask that it may be printed as an appendix to the remarks which I am now making, that the RECORD may bear upon its face some testimony of the value of our American volunteers to their flag and country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that order will be made.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, a brief synopsis of this statement of battles or actions in the Philippine Islands will show that in the period of seventeen months comprehended in that statement, and up to June 30, 1900, there were twelve hundred and thirteen actions fought. In some of them there were no casualties on our side. It does not follow from that fact that they were not important, that they were not dangerous, or that there were not casualties upon the other side. Some of the great battles of history have been fought with few casualties on the side of the winner. At San Jacinto, which won Texas from Mexico, but one man was killed; and at New Orleans, where the British were decimated, not a dozen Americans were killed.

Let us see what was the part taken in these actions by the volunteers. The number of actions in the Philippines from February 4, 1899, to June 30, 1900, was 1,213. Six hundred and sixteen of them were fought solely by volunteers. One hundred and ninety-nine of them were fought by both volunteers and regulars. Three hundred and ninety-eight were fought by regulars alone. In other words, the volunteers fought in 33 per cent more actions alone than the regulars fought in alone.

The volunteers fought in over 800 of the 1,200 actions, and in 616 of them they had no reenforcement or assistance from the regulars. The regulars fought in 597 actions altogether, and in only 398 without the aid of volunteers. The volunteers fought in 219 more actions than the regulars. I do not think that men who have furnished the forces to fight by themselves 616 actions for the United States, or 1 action for every day and 105 actions over, ought to be told, as they are coming back home from victorious fields that they have won, that there is not a man amongst them whom the Congress of the United States is willing to intrust with a commission in the Regular Army as high even as the rank of captain.

What are soldiers, Mr. President?

> They are but ambition's tools
> To hew a way to her unlawful ends;
> And when they are old and hacked and hewn with service,
> Cast away to rust in peace and rot in hospitals.

That is what a caustic poet said. But if this bill passes in the present form it will be the most painful, practical, matter-of-fact historical illustration of those lines that we can see anywhere in human history. I am not appropriating to this topic that line about "ambition's tools," which attributes "unlawful ends" to the military service in which our soldiers have been employed. I only quoted that line inasmuch as it was in the verse, and I am not now animadverting in any respect upon the character of our war in the Philippine Islands, nor do I intend to intermix any question as to the organization of our Army with the policies which should govern us in making war. But "to rust in peace" now is the doom of the volunteer in this bill after the hospital and battlefield experience of the Philippines is over.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Virginia allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. What the Senator says about the volunteer officers is, of course, true; no one can gainsay it; but could a volunteer officer be appointed a captain without being put ahead for all time, or at least as long as he lives or until he retires, of every first lieutenant in the Regular Army?

Mr. DANIEL. Of course not.

Mr. SPOONER. There can be but one answer to that.

Mr. DANIEL. That is true.

Mr. SPOONER. I presume there are in the Regular Army a great many first lieutenants fighting, and fighting with the utmost gallantry and skill, in the Philippines.

Mr. DANIEL. Undoubtedly there are.

Mr. SPOONER. Now, would it be a fair thing to take a volunteer officer as against all those first lieutenants and put him, as long as he lives, ahead of them in opportunity for promotion to a captaincy?

Mr. DANIEL. Let me put another case to the Senator, and when he answers my question I will answer his question, and frankly. If you take a first lieutenant in the Regular Army and promote him now because he has shown particular gallantry in battle, does he not stand above all the other first lieutenants in the Army?

Mr. SPOONER. They are taken by seniority.

Mr. DANIEL. I do not think you ought to do that. I am going to attack that also. I do not think seniority ought to be made the invariable rule.

Mr. SPOONER. Then you open the door——

Mr. DANIEL. You open the door for brave men and distinguished men to walk in.

Mr. SPOONER. Not only that, but you open the door for political and personal and social influence.

Mr. DANIEL. When you get the good you are bound to take the bad with it. They are inseparable in nature. "There is none perfect. No; not one."

Mr. SPOONER. But do you not take more bad than good?

Mr. DANIEL. When you have a bad Administration you do, but when you have a good Administration you get more good than bad. If you have a bad Administration you get more bad than good. I am not reflecting on this Administration at all; I am only trying to answer according to the fact, for this Administration has a great deal of good in it, but I think also it is human. What Administration is not?

Mr. SPOONER. The President would find it difficult to resist a Senator if he had a good case.

Mr. DANIEL. No doubt he would do the best he could.

I think there can be good, honest Senators here, and men who seek nothing in their place but their country's good, and if it were not for the modesty of my learned friend I would say I believe I am addressing one at the present time. I believe, also, in the truth and honesty and patriotism of the great majority of my colleagues of public life. I do not believe that many men are here to serve their country with improper motives.

If a Senator wants to recommend a man for appointment in the Army, he has a right to do it, and I take it for granted that as a rule—he will make mistakes, as everybody else makes mistakes; but in the main and for the most part he will act rightly about it, and I want to give an opportunity to act rightly in behalf of men who have rendered particular service. You have dishonest judges, you have dishonest officers, you have dishonest representatives now and then, but I believe that the great bulk of the world is honest in the performance of its tasks, and if it were not so that we would have gone to pieces and to somewhere else long ago.

Now, the question is whether we must give up absolutely to an ironbound rule, which will destroy the ambition of men to excel in battle and leave their fellows, and make longevity, the mere eking out of existence, the great object to a Regular Army officer in order to get promotion, or to make distinguished valor and distinguished service a thing that has an opportunity to win a star. Every people of military spirit in the world are bound when they go into action to recognize distinguished merit, and no army and no people ought ever to submit to any other rule, by self-accusation that they are not honest enough to observe it without partiality.

Men will always be more or less partial. It has been the rule of the world ever since the world began, but you can not elevate human nature by destroying its good traits in order that you may also destroy its bad traits. You must take the good and the bad together, always striving to give the good the advantage, and in the long run and in most cases it will be a winner. If that were not so, there would be no difference between good and evil, or good in achievement would fall behind the bad.

Mr. President, I was just showing here with reference to the Philippine Islands that more than half of our war there had been conducted and won solely by American volunteers. And while not disparaging the regulars, I only claim for the volunteer that he ought to have some equitable share in those promotions which are consequent upon that war in which he has taken so noble and worthy a part.

Let me further answer the very pertinent question of the distinguished Senator who has just queried me. It is hard for any first lieutenant in the Regular Army to see a volunteer officer step to a higher grade than he possesses. I admit that. But it is also hard for a volunteer, who has served in battles as captain, major, or colonel, turned out wholly, with regular lieutenants taking all the high places. And let it be remembered about the Regular Army, Mr. President, that in this war its numbers have been more than doubled, and that all the officers of the Regular Army have already had, and will in the further increase of the Army have, for a second time, a peculiar opportunity for advancement. There are 400 more regular officers now than there were at the beginning of the Spanish-American war. That means that 400 higher places have been filled by promotions of those who were beneath them, and in a very rapid manner.

Furthermore, it was stated by the chairman of the Military Committee only a day or two ago that the reorganization of the Regular Army would probably find no second lieutenants in it. I know of young men who graduated at Westpoint after the Spanish-American war began who have participated in battles in the Philippine Islands as first lieutenants in the Regular Army. There was one of them from my own State, a gallant young officer from Westpoint, who was wounded at Santiago as soon as he got there, was quickly promoted to the rank of first lieutenant, and who recently died in the Philippines—young Meade, of Clark County, Va. A little later young Bentley, a volunteer captain from my State, was killed there in battle. And many other States of the Union have a like record.

Now, I do not want to, and I will not, disparage officers of either class. My sympathy is with them, and not only with the volunteer, but my sympathy is with every regular officer who is ambitious for promotion and honor in his profession. His is a case that peculiarly appeals to the best sentiments of our hearts for human sympathy; but here, too, is a contest between the two classes of men—the comrades of battle, of wounds, of death—and both of these classes of men are highly deserving, and what I seek to do is, without disparagement of either class, to give to each class an opportunity of fair representation.

Now, you take the men who are majors and colonels of volunteers in the Philippine Islands. A great many of them are men who went there expecting a very short service. When that short service showed that it had not reached its expected result, they were content still to remain. Some of them have been there or elsewhere in the service for two years. They have given up their business and cut themselves off from their former business connections. They will be left as high and dry, so far as business relations are concerned, when they get back to the United States at the end of two years or more of service, as the regular officer would be if he were dismissed from his place in the Regular Army.

Some of them it may be will not desire to go into the Regular Army; probably the majority will not, but some of them have been educated at military schools, just as Westpointers have been. Some of them have been long looking forward to an opportunity of military life and distinction, and when they have seized that opportunity and given up the safety, and the attractions, and the opportunities, and the advantages of wealth that lie in civil life and have gone 7,000 miles away from home to a tropical climate and exposed themselves for two years in front of the enemy, all that I claim is that they ought to have as generous consideration as the Senate is able to give them without trenching unduly upon the appropriate rights of recognition of the officers of the Regular Army.

This, Mr. President, is about all I have to say upon the subject, but I wish that the Senate could have the aid of the distinguished soldiers on the Military Committee, men who are also largely experienced in civil affairs, and in those of the volunteer service, to open up some door here that would not be arbitrary and would not be too wide open to give to our volunteer officers a fair show in the reorganization of the Army.

It is stated by the chairman, I believe, of the Military Committee that as we are not out of sight of war we may anticipate that this is an establishment that will long endure. In my judgment, Mr. President, this country will be fortunate indeed if it shall extricate itself honorably and fairly from the complications which we have gotten into in the Orient without wanting many more men than the hundred thousand that are here provided for in this bill.

I wish that here and now we could recur to the old volunteer system of the United States. I believe it to have been the best system of national defense that the wit of man has ever devised, and I have regretted in the Spanish war, and regret now, any departure from it in any new schemes of military organization.

According to the old system of volunteers, the Federal Government called upon all the States to render to the Federal Government their appropriate proportionate number of men and officers. The States then organized the companies and the battalions, and furnished not only the men, but furnished also the company and regimental officers. The President appointed the general officers, and I believe in many cases the staff officers. With the National Guards at home, with but little expense to the Government, we would under the development of that volunteer system have an inexpensive army in reserve at all times, ready at the tap of a drum to come to the front and be organized, under generals appointed by the Federal President, for the national defense.

Now, Mr. President, there was not only the advantage in that system of a ready and almost instant organization, but there were great advantages of it to the soldiers. When the volunteers came from distinctive communities of our country, each of them had a quartermaster's establishment and a commissariat, with a line of approach to the military camp from the homes of the people.

The people were being constantly advised in their communities of the conditions of the Army, and supplies for the Army from home were constantly reenforcing the supplies furnished by the Government. Home was always in contact with the Army, that was striking for the honor and safety of the country. But when you take volunteers indiscriminately from here and there without social, without domestic, and without local connections, you sever them from the most conservative and the best influences that can follow the soldier in his career, and you cut the soldier off from many adjuncts of military life which would be a strength and a comfort and a solace to him in camp.

In the late war with Spain we organized our volunteers for the first time in American history by conferring upon the President power, or by the assumption of power by the Federal Government, to appoint all the company and all the regimental officers. There was a rush then to the Federal Government from every State in the Union, from California to Texas and from Maine to Florida, and there could not be on the part of the Federal Government that knowledge of the candidates for these positions that exists in local authorities and in influential quarters in the States and cities and counties from whence they came.

Mr. President, if I had authority I would fill this gap that we now need to be filled according to the dictate of present conditions by calling for American volunteers. I do not believe that they would be lacking. I do not believe that there is any occasion that could arise in the history of our country in which the President would say, "I want 30,000 or 40,000 volunteers," in which the patriotism of the American people would not instantly respond in every State of this Union. I believe it would be better for them to respond with volunteers, and to let the volunteer know that the country always had him in mind and in eye as its natural and prompt defender than to relegate him thus unceremoniously to the rear from battlefields upon which he has evinced his spirit of self-sacrifice and honor and courage, and replace him, officers and men, by those mustered into the regular service of the United States.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator from Virginia allow me just one remark?

Mr. DANIEL. With pleasure.

Mr. HAWLEY. Is he not aware that every single, solitary soldier down to drummer, both regular and volunteer, is a volunteer now? Every man in the Regular Army is a volunteer.

Mr. DANIEL. That just construes everything away. Of course I know that there has been no conscription in this country. But what does the Senator mean when he makes a report here recommending that the volunteers may be first lieutenants and the regulars may be colonels, if they are all volunteers? If they are all volunteers, then let us put all of our volunteers on the same footing. Why does the Senator so discriminate against one set of volunteers in favor of another set of volunteers? He is discriminating against the volunteers who have fought the battles in favor of volunteers who have not fought so many battles.

Now, Mr. President, as I see I can not have my way as to the reorganization of the Army, I shall only insist upon such reasonable and just changes as seem not only to be compatible with equity, but to be commanded by equity. Let me say further, that when we open a door which makes it possible for some volunteer officers and some volunteer men to remain in the Army of the country which they have served so honorably and well for the last two years, we do not, by any means, determine that they shall hold many, and certainly not all, the places which they are thus made eligible for. Every man in the United States who is 30 years of age and has a home in any State is eligible for the office of Senator, but there is a great deal of difference between being eligible for the office and being selected to fill it, for but 90 after all, at one time, can fill it.

I would not require that the President should appoint one class or another of these officers to many of these places, but I would simply leave it to his wisdom and discretion. I know he will be assailed with political influence. I know that in some cases political influence will procure appointments which it is difficult for the President to resist and which it is difficult for him to be well informed about before he makes them. That is to a degree an evil; but can any system of human concern be devised or recommended that does not bring some evil along with it? Is a Regular Army for life, with retirement and pay of its officers in their latter days, itself an unadulterated good? Do we not know that certain faults arise with all systems, and that republican government itself is full of faults which monarchy would readily alleviate?

We can not devise any system, Mr. President, which has not got all sorts of human faults in it; but the question is, Which system is the most advantageous and which is with the least faults? I believe a system which will keep the Army of the country constantly refreshed with new material from the woods and fields and workshops and countingrooms of the United States is a better system than the structure of a military class which soon becomes inoculated with and saturated with the ideas of militarism.

Take 100 or 200 of the very best men who were ever born upon this earth, isolate them from the rest of the community and put them in a profession, be it military, legal, medical, scientific, or what not, unless their body is constantly refreshed by new material, bringing into it the new ideas which percolate throughout the country, and the popular ideas that obtain with the people, it will be an exclusive class, with little sympathy with other classes of their countrymen. We have seen this in the church in human history; we have seen it in the army in human history; we have seen it upon the bench in human history; we have seen it in legislative bodies in human history, and it manifests itself in all human concerns.

Now, the best compromise of this matter, in my judgment, is to open the door to volunteer appointments, and let the President of the United States make such discriminations in favor of regular officers which their merit and which their service, distinguished by valor or by time or by fidelity, as sound judgment may direct.

If this can not be done, then I hope this amendment at least may be voted for, Mr. President, and that the recommendation of the Lieutenant-General Commanding the Army may be taken. It is a tempering of the wind to the shorn lamb; and as all volunteer officers above the rank of first lieutenant are inevitably, under this bill, to be dropped out of the service without further notice from the Government, it is just, I think, to let the President have the power to appoint some of them, here and there at least, to the command of a company.

ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE, Washington, D. C., October 1, 1900.

H. C. CORBIN, Adjutant-General.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, I suppose every Senator on the floor has personal friends in the volunteers, friends in whose welfare he is greatly interested. I have, and I presume every Senator has; men who have done well in their service in the Philippines, and whom we would like to have secure good places in the regulars. I might mention several cases in which I have an interest. I have two friends who are majors of volunteers. One of them was selected quite recently to lead the principal column which took what was said by the papers to be the strongest Filipino fortress in the islands. Over a thousand men were selected to make the attack, and his battalion was selected to lead the principal column. He would, of course, be glad of a position as captain and glad of one as first lieutenant.

But, Mr. President, it seems to me it would be a very great injustice to appoint these men who have had but short service—arduous, gallant, I admit, but very brief. The great number of battles the Senator from Virginia has alluded to were quite different in character from those in which the Senator himself won such great renown.

Now, Mr. President, the appointment of captains of volunteers to the regulars involves the jumping of 764 first lieutenants, to say nothing of over 400 second lieutenants, making a little upward of 1,200 in all. They have been serving right along with the volunteers, and had six, eight, and ten years' previous service. Many of them were engaged in that battle of the regulars, the great battle of the Spanish war, at San Juan and El Caney, in which very few volunteers took part. Those were especially engagements of the regulars.

Now, the injustice of this is so manifest that it does not seem to me necessary to say anything about it. One point all will see. Regulars are now serving in the volunteers with increased rank. Several first lieutenants of regulars are serving in the Philippines as majors. The amendment would authorize their reappointment in the regulars with increased rank, jumping over their fellow regulars, a large number of them. There is so much wrong in it that I trust it will not be seriously considered.

Mr. McCOMAS. Will the Senator from Vermont let me ask him a question?

Mr. PROCTOR. Certainly.

Mr. McCOMAS. He has spoken of the very gallant volunteer major who jumped a great many fine young lieutenants and led a thousand men and took a place deemed impregnable. He did it gallantly. The country was benefited and glorified. Does the Senator think that the public service was hurt much that that volunteer jumped juniors in time of battle to perform that achievement? Does it not show that metal of that sort ought not to be lost from the Army? If that major were made captain of regulars it might be an infusion which would help the bureaucratic system of the Regular Army.

Mr. PROCTOR. Unfortunately we have no system by which individuals can be selected and rewarded by promotion for special service.

Mr. McCOMAS. If the Senator will allow me, the amendment of the Senator from Virginia would permit the selection of that captain who had been a volunteer major, and, perhaps, very much for the benefit of the whole Army.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, it would open these places to a very large number, and there is no certainty that the specially deserving might be selected. I think it would be unjust to select any in this case for so high promotion. One of the great difficulties the committee has met with—the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] will indorse me in that, I am sure—is the claims from all quarters for changes in the measure to hit particular cases. The committee have considered it very carefully, so as to do justice as far as possible to all and the least possible injustice to any.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. PROCTOR. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is very strange to me that the Senator from Vermont should be unwilling to trust the President to be discreet in the selection of these men for the appointment of captain; but if he is afraid of the political influences which are always at work to embarrass the Executive, could he not put some limitation on the appointment to captain, confining it, for instance, to those who have been mentioned for distinguished gallantry by their superiors, or something like that? Limit the President—in other words, defend the President from the importunities of politicians—by simply providing that only such officers as have distinguished themselves shall be appointed captains. Why not make some provision like that?

Mr. PROCTOR. I believe, Mr. President, we have not succeeded so far, since the Government was established, in freeing the President from the importunities of politicians, and I do not believe he can be relieved from that. These volunteers are largely appointed by the favor of friends. We have all of us taken our part in it. They are fighting by the side of regulars, who are not represented here and who never asked for these personal favors.

Mr. TILLMAN. Let us grant that—that the volunteers are nearly all or entirely appointed upon the recommendation and solicitation of public men. Does that imply that those who have been unworthily appointed could be promoted or appointed in this way after they were examined by a board, as is provided for here? Is not the Senator willing to trust the President and this board to winnow out any unworthy appointments that by accident might be made?

Of course I believe that the President will do the very best he can and not saddle off on the Army any improper person, but when you shut the door absolutely in his face and in the face of these officers, who have shown by their service that they are worthy of this honor, is it not a discrimination that is calculated to discourage even applications from ambitious men, and is it not a slap to those who have won their spurs, so to speak?

Mr. PROCTOR. Has the Senator concluded his question?

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, it was not exactly a question; it was a sort of interchange of views on the subject.

Mr. PROCTOR. I think it is our duty to frame this bill as we think is right. It is for us to determine what is right and what is wrong, and not turn off upon the President any discretion that we should properly exercise here.

Mr. SEWELL. Will the Senator from Vermont allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. PROCTOR. Certainly.

Mr. SEWELL. While I sympathize very much with the Senator from Virginia in his presentation of the case in relation to volunteers—and I belong to that class—at the same time you ought to draw the line and make a distinction between the volunteer, so called, of to-day and the volunteer of 1861. The latter were State troops organized entirely as volunteers, commissioned by the State. Those that are now in existence were organized by the United States Government.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will permit me, were they not almost entirely commissioned from those who had volunteered for the Spanish war? Are there a dozen of the present officers of the 35 regiments who were not officers among the volunteers who responded to the call of the President to fight the Spanish war under conditions similar to those of 1861?

Mr. SEWELL. In answer to that question, I say no. The colonels were colonels of the Regular Army, lieutenants, captains, majors, and they are to-day. The field officers were young officers of the Regular Army. It was a Regular Army organization, and while there are some who to-day occupy field officers' positions by reason of the fact that the Department pursued the course of filling vacancies by promotion in the regiments, at the same time it is to all intents and purposes a Regular Army organization, and it is entirely different from that of 1861. So the officers whom you intend to provide for by this amendment are, as a rule, regular officers to-day, lieutenants, captains, majors, who on the mustering out of these troops go back to their regiments. I make the suggestion that the situation is entirely different from what has been supposed.

The committee had this matter under consideration, and, without any eulogy upon the Committee on Military Affairs, I will state that we are all men who have had experience. We all want to do justice. Under the circumstances, these field officers of the present force being largely regulars, and the term of service having been so short, we thought we would do great injustice to the officers of the Regular Army, those who have graduated, those who are now in the field holding higher commissions, by making the appointments to any greater rank than first lieutenant—and some of those first lieutenancies will do injustice to men who have commanded in these very volunteers, or so-called volunteers, in higher grades. They will go back and have some volunteer appointed over them.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, after what was said about dealing unkindly and unjustly and partially with common men, the private soldier, I will just put in one single example; I can find others similar in the Army Register.

Charles W. Farber became, in 1879, a private. Then he became a sergeant, and then a first sergeant. Then he was in the general mounted service a private, corporal, sergeant, and first sergeant in Troop H, Eighth Cavalry. He is now a first lieutenant after twenty-one years' service. In the meantime he improved his opportunities. He is a graduate of the infantry and cavalry school. If that is not an illustration of the democracy of our Army, I do not know what is. Now it is proposed that a man shall be picked up—I will not say anything offensive, however; he might be and might not—but selected as a captain and put in over this man who started as a private and has had twenty-one years of service.

Mr. President, just one word more incidentally, and purely as a matter of justice. I noticed in one of our excellent papers in town an intimation that certain regular officers were haunting the corridors and said to be lobbying. Well, there has not been one of them here in any such capacity. There is one, who is familiar with every provision of the whole organization and construction of the Army, who has been here considerably. He came in here but once, but he was in the building by the special invitation and request of the Military Committee, because it was only necessary to ask him a question to get an answer on almost anything relating to the discipline and construction of the Army.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL].

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HEITFELD (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. MCMILLAN (when his name was called). Under the same arrangement as to change of pairs heretofore announced by me, I am at liberty to vote, and I vote "nay."

Mr. MONEY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCBRIDE]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH].

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER]. Were he present, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BURROWS. I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY].

Mr. MARTIN. I have a general pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If I had the right to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SPOONER. I rise to announce that my colleague [Mr. QUARLES] has a general pair with the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON].

Mr. BACON (after having voted in the affirmative). In the absence of the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE], I withdraw my vote, as I am paired with that Senator.

Mr. MONEY. I wish to state now for the remainder of this bill that my colleague [Mr. SULLIVAN] is absent, and that he is paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON].

Mr. PETTUS. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—24.

So the amendment of Mr. DANIEL was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the next amendment in order.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I have an amendment I should like to offer, as it relates to this same subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota offers an amendment, which will be stated.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Secretary read the amendment, as follows:

Strike out all provisions in this bill which place an age limit against the appointment of meritorious volunteers to positions in the staff and line of the Regular Army.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota. [Putting the question.] By the sound, the "noes" have it.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is rejected.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator rise to offer an amendment?

Mr. MONEY. I rise to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment in order is one offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE].

Mr. BATE. Which one is that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair supposes that there is nothing in the unanimous-consent agreement which prevents the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] from offering his amendment now, but in the opinion of the Chair it would be more regular to proceed in the order the amendments were received and laid on the table.

Mr. MONEY. I have not a printed amendment, but I should like to move to strike out some words in a paragraph of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be received.

Mr. MONEY. I move to strike out, on page 30, in the newly numbered section 17 of the amendment of the Senate committee, so as to restore the text of the House amendment. I have not heard any reason given here why these changes should be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the words proposed to be stricken out by the amendment of the Senate committee.

The SECRETARY. On page 30, in the newly numbered section 17, in line 11, before the word "paymaster," the Committee on Military Affairs propose to strike out the word "four" and insert "three;" in the same line, after the word "colonel," to strike out "and assistant paymaster-general, five" and insert "four;" in line 13, after the word "lieutenant-colonel," to strike out "and deputy paymaster-general, twenty" and insert "nine;" in line 14, before the word "paymasters," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "twenty-seven;" in line 15, after the word "captain," to insert "mounted;" in line 21, after the word "below," to strike out "twenty" and insert "nine;" in line 24, after the word "paymaster," to insert "and whose age at the date of appointment shall not exceed 40 years;" on page 31, line 1, after the word "section," to insert "and the persons so appointed to the grade of captain shall be promoted according to seniority to vacancies in the grade of major occurring after the number of majors has been reduced to nine."

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 17. That the Pay Department shall consist of 1 Paymaster-General with the rank of brigadier-general, 3 paymasters with the rank of colonel, 4 paymasters with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, 9 paymasters with the rank of major, and 27 paymasters with the rank of captain, mounted: Provided, That all vacancies in the grade of colonel and lieutenant-colonel created or caused by this section shall be filled by promotion according to seniority, as now prescribed by law, and no more appointments to the grade of major and paymaster shall be made until the number of majors and paymasters is reduced below 9: And provided, That persons who have served in the Volunteer Army since April 21, 1898, as additional paymasters, and whose age at the date of appointment shall not exceed 40 years, may be appointed to positions in the grade of captain, created by this section, and the persons so appointed to the grade of captain shall be promoted according to seniority to vacancies in the grade of major occurring after the number of majors has been reduced to 9. So long as there remain surplus majors an equal number of vacancies shall be held in the grade of captain, so that the total number of paymasters authorized by this section shall not be exceeded at any time.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I intended to confine my amendment to the words in brackets in regard to the number of paymasters, the assistant paymaster-general, and the deputy paymaster-general; in other words, I want to restore the number as fixed by the House of Representatives. I do not propose to amend the text of the Senate committee any further than as to the number of the Paymaster's Corps.

I have not heard anything said in the debate about the reasons for decreasing the number of paymasters; and it seems to me there are very substantial and sound reasons why the number should not be decreased.

Mr. President, I will withdraw my amendment for the present, and let the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE], who has mistaken my purpose, secure action upon his amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Mississippi is withdrawn for the present.

Mr. BATE. I now ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the amendment proposed by me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate an amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE], which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 40, after line 9, it is proposed to insert:

And those volunteer officers, not over 30 years of age, who held commissions during the war with Spain and are now serving in the Regular Army.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] has offered a similar amendment that has been acted upon by the Senate, and he asked that this amendment may be passed over temporarily until we can decide as to that matter. It is a very meritorious amendment, but I think it had better stand until the Senator from Wyoming and I can agree about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire this amendment to be passed by for the present?

Mr. BATE. I suppose so. It may be included in another amendment, and, if so, we had better look into the matter and ascertain as to that. It is a meritorious amendment, but I have no objection to its being laid aside for the present. I now ask to have the next amendment I offered laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator had better examine the new print of the bill and see exactly where he desires this amendment to come in.

Mr. BATE. I will, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not think the place indicated in the printed amendment is the proper place for it.

Mr. BATE. It was the proper place in the first print of the bill, but I do not know where it should be inserted in the last print. The next amendment I offered is the one I wish to have acted upon now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Tennessee which has been read will be passed by for the present. The Chair lays before the Senate the next amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE], which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 32, section 20, strike out all after the word "colonel," in line 13, down to and including the words "and 10 cooks," in line 18, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Two lieutenant-colonels, 5 majors, 19 captains, and 19 first lieutenants. The enlisted force of the Signal Corps shall consist of 10 companies, whose status of service shall be the same as companies of the Corps of Engineers. Each company shall consist of 9 first-class sergeants, 18 sergeants, 18 corporals, 45 privates (who may be either of the first or second class), and 1 cook.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, this is an amendment that adds a small increase, I am frank to say, in the number of commissioned officers and noncommissioned officers in the Signal Corps of the Army.

I ask the attention of the Senate to the fact that there is a marked distinction between that and other corps or departments of the Army. The Signal Corps is comparatively a new one. It is a growing corps. It has been nursed by the Government to an extent, and it has been thus far very successful. Now it is desired by some few Senators on the committee along with myself that that corps shall be perfected as far as possible in order to secure the best results in the operations now going on in the Philippines and elsewhere.

I propose to show what the commander of the army there, General MacArthur, has said in regard to this matter, and I propose to repeat in substance what has been stated to me by General Greely, the head of this corps.

I think, if we differentiate this from some other propositions to increase the Army, that the Senate will certainly adopt the amendment. I believe that it is for the interests of the Army and for the interests of the country that this should be done.

At the outset I beg to say that we are not asking for an enlargement of a large corps or for the creation of a new corps. This amendment will add no new corps, as has been intimated. It simply provides for an increase in a small corps which is now in active work and rendering very efficient service.

It is known, it has been stated here, and it is a fact that there are more than 400 Army posts in the Philippines. Most of those posts require an expert to be there, one who can telegraph and look over matters of that nature, and attend to the correspondence in that line. We have not half enough officers and men for that purpose. So says the general in command in the Philippines, and so says the head of this corps. Therefore I say it is practical and good judgment for us to give him what is necessary or what he believes to be necessary.

Besides, Mr. President, these are scientific men. It is not like getting enlisted men here and there of every character and description. The men of this corps have to be of peculiar capacity. They have to be men of fine intelligence and education. They should be well skilled in the art of taking observations and performing other things that are necessary in the conduct of this corps.

Under those circumstances men can not be detailed from the Army. It has been said, by way of reply to this proposed increase, that the men ought to be taken from the Army; but, Mr. President, that can not be done, for the reason that there is not generally found in the Army the kind of men that ought to be selected for this service. It is necessary to have among them some men who are electricians and others who are experts in telegraphy. That is the class of men the Signal Corps must have.

We should make an exception in this case, and I ask the attention of the Senate, especially of the Military Committee, of which I am a member, and which failed to report this amendment. I think the necessity is such that I am justified, as a member of the committee, in disagreeing with the majority, and in presenting the facts to the Senate.

This bill discriminates against the Signal Corps in this way: It fails to give it a sufficient number of commissioned officers to properly and practically conduct its business; and while it fails to do that, it gives a full complement to all the other corps, and grants, I believe, whatever their chiefs say is necessary for the conduct of those corps. I say there has been an invidious discrimination made against this corps that ought not to be made. I am for the restoration in this bill of what was placed in it in the House, because I think it just, proper, and necessary for the success of the Signal Corps; and this corps is essential for the success of the Army that is now organized and operating in the Philippines.

The committee concede—and I ask the attention of the Senate to this—the fact that there is a necessity for an increase in this corps, because they allow 20 more lieutenants than the original draft of the bill did; but then they limit their official life. They allow 10 first and 10 second lieutenants, making 20; and they also allow an increase of 50 first-class privates, thus conceding the necessity for an increase in the corps. But the bill says these additional men can only stay there for one year. That is improper, because, as I have said, these are experts, they are scientific men, and they have to be in the corps permanently, and therefore should not be limited as to duration of commission.

Not only that, but we are told by officers interested in this matter that you can not enlist men for so short a time as that proposed; and therefore it is necessary to put them in the Regular Army, with the hope of future preferment. The number I have named in this amendment is certainly not excessive.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question for information only?

Mr. BATE. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPOONER. Was the amendment referred to the War Department?

Mr. BATE. I think so; but I do not know the attitude of the War Department in regard to this amendment. I think, however, the Secretary of War is against it. I know that General Greely, the Chief of the Corps, advocates it.

Mr. SPOONER. What officer except General Greely recommends it?

Mr. BATE. I do not know of any. I do not know that it has been submitted to any other officer to recommend it. It comes directly from General Greely to me, and I have presented the amendment in the form it bears——

Mr. SEWELL. I will state to the Senator that I had a talk with General Greely on this same subject. He would like to increase his corps, as a matter of course. I went to see the Secretary of War, and I can state that he is opposed to the amendment. He wants the corps to stay as it is. He says, while General Greely may not have everything he wants, he will give him sufficient details wherever necessary to cover his work.

Mr. BATE. Then it stands in this way: The Secretary of War, I believe, is against the amendment, and he is for his own scheme; that is, he does not want to go outside of the beaten track which has been laid down in the bill. But I propose to do it independently, because I think it is proper it should be done. I am as liberal upon these propositions as anybody can be, and I am against an increase of the Regular Army to a larger number than is absolutely necessary; but this is an increase which I think is justifiable and one which is called for by the commanding general in the Philippines, General MacArthur, as well as by General Greely.

Mr. FORAKER. May I interrupt the Senator at that point?

Mr. BATE. Yes, sir.

Mr. FORAKER. I only wish to say that I had a talk with General Miles in regard to this amendment the other day when he was in the Senate Chamber, and he favored it most strongly.

Mr. BATE. I did not know that.

Mr. FORAKER. He said it ought by all means to be adopted; and he spoke of the efficient services rendered by the Signal Corps and of the necessities of the corps as proposed by this amendment.

Mr. BATE. I am glad of the suggestion, and I thank the Senator for it. I did not know of it. I had not seen the General of the Army in regard to it, but I am glad to know that he favors it, because it is just, proper, right, and absolutely necessary, and no one has a better opportunity to know what ought to be done than he or would more frankly assert it.

I invite the attention of the Senate to a statement I am about to read from the man who is in command in the Philippines, General MacArthur, in regard to the Signal Corps in the Philippines, its efficiency and necessity. He says in his September report:

> I respectfully inclose an extract from a former report as the quickest way of expressing my views of the importance of the Signal Corps. I desire to add that all subsequent experience has confirmed the convictions expressed therein, and to renew the recommendation then submitted for the enlargement and perfection of the Signal Corps of the regular establishment. The splendid service of this corps makes it a matter of regret that in operations in these islands we have not had as much force from that body as is necessary. As it is, their wire service is simply indispensable.

He then adds:

> It is not too much to say that in absence of this efficient service it would be impossible to hold this archipelago with less than 150,000 men, which is now well and efficiently performed by 60,000.

It shows that this Signal Corps is equal to 60,000 men or more, and that he wants to perfect it, and that it is necessary to perfect it, in order that he may have success there in the control and management of this army.

Now, then, if the general who is there in command says that this corps, if properly officered and put into efficient form, is equal to 60,000 or 75,000 men—as he does say in this report—and that he can do all that is necessary in those islands with 60,000, but needs its services to do it, is it not economy, I ask the Senate, for it to be done? Is it not right and proper to be done, and do we not know it is perfectly practical?

We are all, Mr. President, natural men on the committee, and we as a committee are often embarrassed and can not do that which some of us would like to do, for the reason that there are several Army corps or departments which I might name, but it is unnecessary, all of which are exceedingly solicitous for advancement, and they desire an increase of the number of commissioned officers, but the committee can not give it, because they can not give it to one without doing seeming injustice to others.

So they declined to increase this corps—whether on that principle or for other reasons I do not know. I do not attribute improper motives to anyone. But human nature is the same whether in or out of the committee room. This increase is shown to be absolutely essential by the commanding officer of the army in the Philippines, and are we to override his recommendation in this regard, and that of the Lieutenant-General commanding the entire Army, in order to adopt the bill in its entirety? This is a case of that kind. The committee might well have acted and put it upon a par with the other corps, but, as I have suggested, it should be differentiated because of the necessities of the case. General MacArthur says:

> It would be impossible to hold this archipelago with less than 150,000 men, which is now well and efficiently performed by 60,000. We need wires, instruments, and operators everywhere—the more the better—it simplifies everything, makes unity of action possible, and insures concentration of troops on threatened points, and altogether it is of such importance that it is impossible to say too much in behalf of its indefinite extension to the limit of possible usefulness.

And, further, he says in regard to it:

> If the principle of extending this corps is admitted, the proper limit for the organization must be determined by investigation in the War Department. So far as the commissioned personnel is concerned, it would seem to me that it ought to be doubled at once, perhaps trebled.

If the general in command in the Philippines says that, can we deny to him that which he asks for in such plain terms? If we stand upon the idea that this would be overriding this scheme or deviating from the path which has been blazed out for us by the Secretary of War, if we stand upon a delicacy of that kind, we will give no increase; but if we look to the interests of the country and to the interests of the Army, if we heed the chief of this corps, who has spoken to us in this positive and unmistakable language, it seems to me we will give at once what he calls for.

Mr. President, I am not asking the Senate to create a new corps. Do not let us be alarmed about that, because some of us do not wish it done. We do not want to extend the power of the Regular Army, either. But this proposition does not involve that. This is different. It is not a new corps. It is an old corps, of very small proportions at that, and one which has not a large force connected with it. Right here let me show the organization of this small but useful—aye, essential—corps.

Organization of present corps, regulars and volunteers.

	Regulars.	Volunteers.
Brigadier-general	1
Colonel	1
Lieutenant-colonel	1
Majors	1	4
Captains	5	9
First lieutenants	2	19
Second lieutenants		15
Total	11	47
Subtract 6 volunteers who are also in regular establishment		6
Total number of volunteer officers at present		41

Proposed establishment.

	Senate.	House.
Brigadier-general	1	1
Colonel	1	1
Lieutenant-colonels	1	2
Majors	3	5
Captains	9	19
First lieutenants	9	19
	24	47
0 first lieutenants and 10 second lieutenants of volunteers until June 30, 1902	20
Total	44

Subtracting the 11 officers of the present regular establishment from the 24 proposed by the Senate will leave only 13 original vacancies to be filled from the 41 present officers of volunteers. This will leave 28 volunteers, 20 of whom can be given temporary appointments until June 30, 1902, leaving the other 8 to be discharged.

Now, all that there are in the Regular Army of this corps, doing, as General MacArthur says, service which amounts to that of 60,000 men, are 11 commissioned officers in the regular service. The volunteers have 47, but 6 off in the regular corps, leaving 42.

All that I ask—and I wish the Senate's attention to that—is simply to hold those volunteers that we now have in the service. That is it, in substance, and that is the House bill. It is what we have agreed to heretofore. I see no reason at this time for withdrawing that force which we have heretofore given, and which has been declared necessary by the chief of corps and the General Commanding. Therefore there are but 11 of those and 42 of the volunteers. The proposed establishment by the Senate now in this bill is 24.

The House has 47, but 42 really. Ten first lieutenants and 10 second lieutenants of volunteers are to go out July 30, 1902. The committee in the bill propose to retain 20 for one year. They admit by this the necessity for the increase, and I think the committee are estopped from denying the necessity for this increase, because they, in their report here in their bill, have put on an amendment which says that 10 of the first lieutenants and 10 of the second lieutenants are necessary to carry on this work, and therefore they put them on and retain them for a year longer without giving them any regular commissions.

There is another question which I wish to suggest. Why is it that they do that to this corps, extend only one year, when in all the other corps and departments of the Army they act differently, by putting those needed in the Regular Army? With one or two exceptions not a single volunteer can be found in the bill that has not been taken care of when belonging to other departments. Then why should you make fish of one and flesh of the other?

Look at this small corps which is struggling and which has met the approval of all associated with it. It has done efficient service ever since its organization, and it is now declared by the General to be indispensable. Why make this invidious distinction against it?

Mr. President, what has the Signal Corps done and what is it doing? I have shown you its dimensions, and that it is necessary to have these others. We want one thing; that is, retain the House bill as it came to us and let not the knife of retrenchment go too deeply when a necessity exists, as its does, for its retention.

This invidious distinction is unjust and ought not to be made. The work of this corps in the Philippine Islands is of such a character that it can not be dispensed with, and the general himself says it ought to be increased—doubled and trebled is the phrase he uses here. If we can not respect his wishes in this matter, whose should we respect? I repeat, if we can not follow the recommendation of the general in command where the service is being rendered, General MacArthur, to whom can we look? Whose arm should we strengthen in this exigency but his, and he says it is necessary.

Mr. FORAKER. Before the Senator from Tennessee concludes I should like to ask him a question. I have been unable to get a copy of his proposition. Will he please explain just what the effect of it is? Is it to restore the House provision?

Mr. BATE. Yes, sir.

Mr. FORAKER. Simply that?

Mr. BATE. Yes, sir; and that corresponds to the volunteer organization as they now have it, with a very slight difference.

Mr. FORAKER. Then you strike out the proviso at the end of the section?

Mr. BATE. Which is that?

Mr. FORAKER. On page 33. If you restore the House text, you can strike out the provision about continuing a certain number of officers for one year.

Mr. BATE. Yes.

Mr. FORAKER. This supersedes it?

Mr. BATE. This supersedes it. Those are the 20 lieutenants. I have spoken of that. There are but 10 first and 10 second lieutenants. That clause will be taken out, of course.

This corps, as I said, has a history. What is its history in brief? It might not be uninteresting to state some facts in regard to it, for I have been identified with it almost ever since I have been in the Senate. This service and the Weather Bureau originally existed together, and they were divided in 1890. The Weather Bureau went to the Department of Agriculture, and this was retained in the War Department. It so happened that I was the author of the bill that divided and reorganized this corps and that of the Weather Bureau.

If I understand its history correctly, about 1860 the first step was taken for an organization of this kind by Dr. Myer, for whom the fort over here across the river was named, as Senators will remember. Dr. Myer got up a system and commenced organizing out on the Western plains. Gen. Horace Porter and other lieutenants were with him, and General Alexander, of our Army in the South, was also with him as a lieutenant. They worked up this system. It was done principally by Dr. Myer. They aided him.

Afterwards, the war breaking out soon thereafter, in 1861, between the States, this was adopted. It was perfected. It became a sign language which was used by both armies. General Alexander established it in the Confederate army before it was adopted by the Federal Army. Horace Porter became a general in the Regular Army. Mr. Myer established this fort and kept it up and organized it more thoroughly. In our army we got the benefit of it through General Alexander, who was a lieutenant at the time with Dr. Myer.

They brought about this perfection of the system—this sign language, so to speak. Then it became organized and was divided, as I tell you, in 1890 between the Weather Department, which took one branch of it, and the Signal Corps, which took the other, and it has been going on since, with a slight increase. They had but 9 officers and 50 sergeants to start with. The history of this corps has been such that it has established a reputation, and, Mr. President, to-day, even in Germany and France and England and all the European countries, the plan of this corps has been adopted, with few changes.

Look at Pekin. During the China war, what was the first information we got from there? Sir, we got it from this very corps eight days ahead of all other sources of information. We got information of the entrance of the army into Pekin eight days before it was known by any others, and no other corps or army corps went there and aided in this thing except the Americans for that length of time. They pushed themselves aggressively. We ask now that it shall be perfected in its form. They pushed themselves aggressively, and gave us the first information that came to us from Pekin.

Not only so, but other instances occurred which are historic. It was this corps which enabled us to capture Geronimo on the plains. They had this language there by sunlight, this sun talk or sun language. That was used there from peak to peak on the mountains surrounding the plains where the Apache chief was. It was difficult to force him to surrender or to capture him, but by the use of the heliograph and flash pan he became alarmed, and his superstition was excited as it would communicate from peak to peak and send its vivid flashes over the plains. They had him surrounded by these lights that were engaged in "sun talk," and he surrendered, and to-day is in prison, and now is restrained in Fort Pickens. It has been shown that this corps is absolutely necessary under certain circumstances; I say, the necessity is beyond compare at this particular time, and therefore it is that I differentiate it from any other proposition in regard to any other corps.

I am not asking that you create a new corps, but here is a necessity which arises, and the practical sense and the good common sense of the Senate, it seems to me, should seize hold of it and do that which General MacArthur himself says is worth 60,000 men to him. Just think of it. All that is necessary to perfect it is to follow what I have done in this amendment, which comes from General Greely. We have seen the work which the corps has done, and it is in its infancy as yet. It is going on. It is one of those progressive things. It is composed of scientific men, of electricians, and telegraphers. There is difficulty, as I said, in enlisting men for it, because we are confined to that particular class.

That is all I have to say about this matter. I do not propose to trouble the Senate further in regard to it. I have no personal feeling whatever, but one for the good of the service and in obedience to a suggestion of the general commanding the army in the Philippines. As suggested by the chief of this corps, it is a small corps and a rising one, and it has demonstrated its utility everywhere in all the cases, and is now in condition to be of greater utility than ever before. In view of these facts, sir, I think that the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President, the Committee on Military Affairs deal with the recognized head of the War Department in respect to information and advice. Everything centers there. We gave the matter of the organization of the Signal Corps the fairest kind of consideration, on the advice of the Secretary of War; but the general commanding that corps comes to us, through one member of the committee, claiming that he has not enough.

As I said a few moments ago, I consulted with the Secretary of War, and he is satisfied that we can get along. This is the only corps, let me say, outside of the Medical Corps, which we have allowed 20 volunteer officers in addition to the regular officers, who remain in it for a period of two or three years, or whatever it may be. I want to have read at the desk a statement just dictated by the Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Before complying with the request of the Military Committees of the Senate and House of Representatives to furnish them with such a bill for the reorganization of the Army as the War Department deemed adequate, the Secretary called upon the general officers of the Army and all the heads of the staff and supply departments and corps for an expression of their views. The head of each department and corps naturally asked for provisions in the bill which would increase the relative prominence and standing of its own department or corps and give the greatest possible opportunity for promotion to its officers.

In view of all the requests, the Secretary made up what he considered to be a fair, consistent, and harmonious general scheme for the arrangement of the different staff departments and corps, and all the different grades of office, with a view to giving to all as nearly as possible the same opportunities for promotion and giving to each its due weight in the service. None of the different departments had assigned to it in this scheme all that it asked. When the subject came before the Military Committees, all the arguments and statements of the heads of departments upon the subject were transmitted to the several committees, and, after full consideration of the subject as a whole, the Military Committee of the House came to the same conclusion as the Secretary, and reported accordingly.

On the floor of the House some changes were made in the brief and hurried consideration of the bill. When the subject came up before the Military Committee of the Senate, that committee took into consideration all the written communications of the staff departments and gave oral hearings to the head of each department. Having then under consideration the whole subject, the Military Committee of the Senate came to the same conclusion as the Military Committee of the House and has reported the same general scheme.

Every authority, therefore, which stands indifferent as between the different departments and has had an opportunity to study and consider the subject as a whole has reached the same conclusion. It is much to be desired that this well-balanced scheme of organization shall not be disturbed by the giving of special advantages to any particular department or corps. Nothing can be done of that kind without unfairness to the other departments and corps, without disturbing the due equilibrium and balance of organization. If the scheme upon which both Military Committees have determined is unsatisfactory, it should be revised as a whole; it should not be unbalanced by sporadic changes in particular points. This is particularly true of the effort now being made to secure a change in the scheme for the benefit of the Signal Corps.

Mr. SEWELL. I will say that within the last day or two we had the matter in relation to the Signal Corps under further consideration, and we did recommend—and it is a part of the bill—50 additional first-class privates for this corps. They are first-class men. They are mechanics. This is a high-grade corps all through. To allow this increase to this corps, after the protest of the Secretary of War, after we have made up everything else on the basis that has been approved by the War Department, would do great injustice to the other departments.

I will say that probably the Chief of the Signal Corps himself does not know what is to be the future of his line of telegraph and cables. The Secretary of War, under the direction of the President, has under consideration to-day the doing away with the work in Cuba and turning it over to commercial enterprise. This may be done very soon. So in Alaska and somewhat in the Philippines. There is no occasion to increase this corps to the extent suggested by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, I have a very high opinion of the Secretary of War, but the very suggestion he makes in the paper which has been read shows the animus of this. It shows that you must not disturb the scheme. What is the scheme? It is this bill as it is. Did you not disturb it here this morning? Did you not knock out section 31 this morning? That was done by the committee, and the Senator from New Jersey was one of the parties who presented it here. Then you have already disturbed the scheme. Why? Because in the sentiment of the Senate they believed it was right to do it when the Teller amendment came up yesterday.

So, Mr. President, they have stricken out the whole of section 31. If it already has been disturbed, and we are to do that which is right for this corps, regardless of what the "scheme" may be, let us look to the practical sense of the thing and see what the necessities are in the Philippine Islands and dare do what is right.

But this does not extend only to that. Sir, it goes further. Look at Cuba, a network of wires put up by these men. They go with the Army, and the idea prevails that they are noncombatants and their duty nonhazardous. Anything but that, if you please. Look at the history of this corps in the Philippines and see its daring and its doing. I have the report here of the officer. They have lost a remarkable percentage. How? By their aggressive, go-ahead spirit, as they went into Pekin and were the first there by eight days to give you information. This corps has pushed itself ahead and gone as pioneers to the front.

They have lost a greater percentage—and here is the report to show it—than any other branch of the Army. They have lost 5.7 per cent in what are called Army losses—"killed, wounded, and captured." Here it is in the report. It is not necessary for me to read it, but I can do it in a moment. I believe I will, just to defend this corps. Let us see if they are noncombatants:

The Signal Corps is called a noncombatant corps, and service therein is frequently spoken of as nonhazardous. That it is extra hazardous, when the Signal Corps is efficiently handled in the field, is shown by records of the past year in the Philippines, where its percentage of strictly war casualties, "killed, wounded, and captured," far exceeds that of the Army as a whole. With an average force of only 362 men, there have been killed, wounded, and captured in active operations 12 men, or 4 per cent of the entire force. Five others have been wounded under conditions not yet reported, thus making the entire percentage of killed, wounded, and captured 5.7 per cent.

It surpasses that of the Army as a whole or of any other corps. Therefore I say they should have our sympathy in this regard. See them in Cuba, where they are extending their work, where they have pushed to the front during the war and when the fighting was going on, under the successful guidance of Colonel Dunwoody. What is their mode of doing it? They have a reel, and they have their wire upon it, and they carry their instruments with them, and they go in the front rank with the skirmishers, if necessary, with the pioneers, if necessary, and then they telephone back or telegraph back the condition of things. In doing that these men have been killed and wounded until they have a greater percentage than any other corps.

Yet because this is a small corps and because this will disturb the scheme of the Secretary of War we are asked to throttle it. It is not just to the corps. Neither is it proper for the interests of the Army, in my opinion. You have them in Alaska. You have them down in Porto Rico. You have them on the coast, both the Pacific and the Atlantic, wherever they are required. How many has this corps now? They have 800, which I forgot to say before. That is the corps now. That is their force. Many of them are sergeants and corporals. They have first sergeants, and then sergeants proper, and then corporals, grading them according to their capacity in this scientific work as electricians, telegraphers, and men of that class.

Then they keep along with the Army, and they push into the front and give the first information. In addition to that they can stand on a peak in that southern and eastern archipelago, where the sun is bright and the air is thin and light, and cast a flash of sunlight with the heliograph and see it and read its sun talk for 50 miles. You see at once the advantage. Hence the truth in the statement of General MacArthur that "I can with 60,000 men hold this country equal to 150,000 if I have an efficient corps of this kind." He says it ought to be doubled and trebled. Do you want to override that information?

Then, again, they have their captive balloon, which rises up beyond any rifle shot. It is attached to the ground, and they have their little wires running down, so they can communicate and give you the situation in the locality all around. General Sherman made an interesting statement in his report on his North Georgia campaign. General Sherman said the Signal Corps saved that part of his army which was in Altoona on his march to the sea.

I say, with emphasis, this corps is not only essential, but indispensable and should be fully organized and equipped. We ought to regard it as sensible and as practical men, representing the interests of the country and of the Army. We ought to give the little increase that is asked for. They have reduced it down now from 800 to 750. Then we gave 50 more yesterday to it. We want a hundred privates. Now, give it what this amendment calls for.

It will make it complete and perfect in its form and organization. It will have ten companies, and a captain for each company, for no one man can communicate with the service in Alaska, and Cuba, and Porto Rico, and the Philippines without having a perfect organization. General Greely said in his report that he was constrained to organize the corps into companies without warrant of law. Now he asks for the warrant of law to do it. Look at these facts. It seems to me that we ought to differentiate it from other organizations for the reasons stated, and we ought to take it out of the scheme and show that we intend to do that which the General of the Army here and in Manila and the Chief of the Corps recommend us to do.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I trust that Senators will give their attention to this amendment for a few moments. The Senator from Tennessee refers to the scheme of the Secretary of War in the framing of this bill. The scheme, so far as any scheme exists, consists in a determined effort upon the part of those best advised to preserve symmetrical proportions between the different branches of the service.

Mr. BATE. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion? I used the word "scheme" as the Secretary of War uses it, as read from the paper which was sent to the desk. He himself calls it a scheme.

Mr. SPOONER. A plan?

Mr. BATE. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. That is all there is to the scheme. It is obviously undesirable to have the cavalry arm of the service out of all proportions to the necessity for the cavalry arm. It is equally undesirable to have the Medical Corps out of all proportions to the needs of that branch of the service. It would be clearly unwise to have the infantry branch of the service entirely out of proportion, as it would the Engineer Corps, or any other subdivision going to make up the Army as a whole.

In the consideration of this bill the committee, consulting the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of War in turn consulting the staff and other officers having to do with the details of the Army, reached the conclusion, after very mature deliberation, that the respective proportions represented in the Senate bill would present to the country an Army in no sense out of proportion in any of its parts.

Again, the scheme of organization constitutes, in some measure, a factor going to the efficiency of the Army.

The amendment of the Senator from Tennessee not only proposes a radical increase over the number of officers and men allowed by the bill as reported by the committee, but it also interjects a new form of organization into the Signal Corps, which, I submit, upon the slightest reflection will be found to be utterly incompatible with efficient service in that branch of the Army.

It will be perceived that the bill as reported by the committee, relating to the various subdivisions of men in this branch of the service, reads as follows:

One brigadier-general, who is the chief or head of the service; 1 colonel. The committee could not perceive where 2 colonels could be advantageously used. One lieutenant-colonel was reported instead of 2 lieutenant-colonels, because we could not understand where, at headquarters or elsewhere, 2 lieutenant-colonels would be necessary. Then 3 majors, 9 captains, 9 first lieutenants, 80 first-class sergeants, 120 sergeants, 150 corporals, 250 first-class privates, 150 second-class privates, and 10 cooks. This constitutes the available force of the Signal Corps in the Regular Army which will exist under this bill.

These officers and men, from the very nature of the service they perform, must be detailed to work here and there, not in companies, but frequently individuals acting at headquarters as telegraph operators and otherwise, belonging to the Signal Corps, but having no company formation whatever. This amendment proposes a company formation which will consist of 91 persons, all told, in each of the 10 companies provided. Now, will anyone suggest the need of company organization in the Signal Corps of the Army? Where will you ever find a situation where 91 men will be required to act under a captain? They do not go into battle in battle array, nor in company formation. Here is a telegraph operator out on the firing line, and there is a detachment of men spreading wire, digging holes, setting up poles, and arranging communication with the rear and front. Company formation interjected in the midst of this kind of an organization would be demoralizing and would detract very seriously from the efficiency of the corps.

Mr. President, realizing the exact condition to which the Senator so aptly refers in the Philippine Islands, the necessity for an extra force for the time being has been recognized by the bill as reported by the committee, and with the amendment suggested by the Senate committee the Senator's amendment does not deal. This provision was added by the committee:

That the President is authorized to continue in service during the present emergency, for duty in the Philippine Islands, 10 volunteer signal officers with the rank of first lieutenant and 10 volunteer signal officers with the rank of second lieutenant. This authority shall extend only for the period when their services may be absolutely necessary; not beyond July 1, 1902.

We thus provide 20 additional officers, and by amendment upon the floor of the Senate 50 additional men were provided. I think these additional provisions are desirable at the present time, but to establish these additional persons as a part of a permanent corps is clearly unnecessary, I assume.

For the last year the Signal Corps has been engaged in constructing telegraph lines, laying cables, establishing stations and lines of communication between the different islands of the Philippine Archipelago and between different points on the respective islands. This work is now in progress. An additional force has been necessary in order to execute the work. But the work will be completed at some time, Mr. President.

If the bill goes through as it is, with the additional force provided as a temporary force, we will, when peace returns and this extra work shall have been disposed of, be possessed of an establishment which can be regularly employed, whereas if we at this time, upon a permanent basis, expand the Signal Corps beyond the necessities of the service, except in an emergency, we will have a useless pay roll. We will have men in the service who are not needed there, because while this frontier is spoken of by the Senator as engrossing the attention of so many of the Signal Office people I doubt whether there is now, outside of Alaska, a single solitary day's work for a signal officer in stretching a telegraph line on this continent.

It is true that in the district of Alaska some work is to be done. In an appropriation bill, passed I think a year or so ago, we made provision for the construction of a telegraph line from Valdez Inlet, on Prince William Sound, to Fort Egbert, on the westerly bank of the Yukon River, and thence to Fort Yukon, and still continuing down the river to Fort Gibbons, and thence to St. Michael. That line is in process of construction. That being completed, the main work in Alaska will have disappeared. Now, I pray, after the Philippine Islands work shall have been completed and the Alaskan telegraph line shall have been stretched, what will remain to be done in time of peace by the elaborate Signal Corps which it is desired here to build up?

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Is there anything in the law which will prevent, if the bill shall pass, the temporary detail of officers by the War Department for service in this corps?

Mr. CARTER. That is a very apt and pertinent question, Mr. President. There is nothing in the law which prohibits it. The law permits the detail of all necessary officers and men to aid in the signal work. Officers and men are detailed to-day in the Philippine Islands from the line of the Army to assist the Signal Corps officers where assistance from the outside is necessary.

Mr. BATE. I think the Senator is mistaken. I am pretty well up on the history of this matter, and I do not know myself where any officers have been detailed and assigned to this corps. It requires a peculiar officer as well as man. He must have a scientific knowledge of this particular branch. I do not know that they have done that. I can not say whether it is true or not, but I know they have been pushed for force; that there are but one or two of them here in Washington City; that they are all out on the frontier now, every one of them, and we have not got enough. That is very evident, Mr. President.

Mr. CARTER. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that 20 officers are now on detail from the line of the Army to render service in the Signal Corps.

Mr. BATE. You mean the 20 the committee recommend here?

Mr. CARTER. They are to be continued.

Mr. BATE. That is what I mean.

Mr. CARTER. They are now in the signal-service work.

Mr. BATE. Of course they are, and they have been there for a year or two; and I say those men ought to be continued there. They ought to be kept there, because they are familiar with the duties. You have given only 20 men; that is, 10 first lieutenants and 10 second lieutenants for all this work, when the general in command over there says you ought to double or treble the number of men you have.

I think there can be no trouble about this matter, Mr. President, if we look at it practically. The Senator has said that as time goes on these men perhaps will have nothing to do. That is a very remarkable statement by him, when he knows that the country is improving and telegraphic wires are going up everywhere. These men are at the head of that kind of work. We have telephones and all character of improvements going on. We have a vast country, with Cuba and Porto Rico, the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, Alaska, and any islands you may get over yonder. All that comes in under the surveillance of these men, and they have got to play their part in that machinery also. It will take scientific men.

Mr. CARTER. Before the Senator from Tennessee resumes his seat I should like to have him state what he has to say in justification of company organization for the Signal Corps.

Mr. BATE. I thank you, sir. I will state, Mr. President, that the man who knows more about it than anyone else, who has organized it from the beginning and who has grown up with it and controls it, says that the necessity was so great in the late war that he was forced, without warrant of law, to organize it into companies. I want no better evidence than that.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, my sympathies have been with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE] for an enlargement, somewhat, of the Signal Corps from some information I have had, but I am rather inclined to change my mind after hearing the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER]. However, I can not understand why the committee propose to discharge these necessary officers at a particular time. If the 20 lieutenants are engaged in the Philippine Islands and are necessary there at this time, it seems to me we had better leave the question as to when their services can be dispensed with to the Secretary of War as the proper authority and not strike them down at a particular moment by legislation. Therefore I suggest to the Committee on Military Affairs that they modify their amendment by omitting the words at the end of the section.

Mr. CARTER. "Not beyond July 1, 1902."

Mr. BATE. Omitting what words?

Mr. CARTER. Omitting the words "not beyond July 1, 1902," at the end of line 11, on page 33.

Mr. ALLISON. I was led to suppose from some things I have heard about the Signal Corps that there is now a large number of officers in the corps. The House provided for 19 captains and 19 first lieutenants instead of 9 of each, as proposed now by the Senate committee. I should be glad to have some member of the committee inform me whether the 19 captains proposed in the House bill are now performing service in the Signal Corps. Our regular force is now to be equal to the force of the Regular Army as at present constituted and the 35,000 volunteers.

Now, we propose to increase the Regular Army to a maximum of 100,000 men, with a minimum. So it seems to me that the Senate committee have made too great a reduction as proposed in the amendment suggested to the House bill. If it is true that these officers now employed in the Signal Corps are not signal officers, but that they are officers detailed from other places in the Army, I think we had better continue the present organization as near as we can until the emergency which seems to be recognized all through the bill shall have passed.

So I suggest in the first place that by agreement we strike out the last clause in the amendment suggested by the committee. Then I should be in favor of moderately increasing the number of signal officers here.

But I can not conceive how it is important that the Signal Corps shall be divided into companies. If the companies are necessary, they certainly can assemble them without a specific direction and order providing that the privates shall be organized in several companies with a captain, first lieutenant, second lieutenant, and so forth.

Mr. BATE. May I make a suggestion?

Mr. ALLISON. I make that suggestion in order that the Senator may answer it.

Mr. BATE. How is it with the Engineer Corps? They are in companies and regiments. They have their colonels, majors, captains, and lieutenants. They do the same kind of service. The engineers are scattered everywhere. How could they be without company formation? They have it. This is nothing new. This provides for nearly the same number of men. The Engineer Corps has a thousand or eleven hundred, and for this corps the number is to be 900. They have now 800. It is simply modeled after the Engineer Corps, and the language used is just that which applies to the Engineer Corps.

Mr. ALLISON. I understood the Senator from Montana to say that this corps is not now organized into companies.

Mr. BATE. It is not organized into companies. That is correct.

Mr. CARTER. They are not organized in companies.

Mr. BATE. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. CARTER. They are just a corps.

Mr. BATE. They are not now organized, but they ask to be put on a footing with the Engineer Corps, and in the nature of their work they are on all fours with the Engineer Corps. If the Engineer Corps has been a success in its organization by companies and by regiments why should not this corps be?

Mr. PROCTOR. The regular Signal Corps is increased by the committee's recommendation in this way. The present corps is 1 major. We gave 3, adding 2.

Mr. FORAKER. Page 32.

Mr. PROCTOR. There are 4 captains at present. We make the number 9, adding 5. There are 3 first lieutenants at present. We make 9, adding 6, besides the temporary addition of 20—10 first and 10 second lieutenants—which was limited to July 1, 1902, but I understand the committee will accept the amendment of the Senator from Iowa striking out the limitation of time.

Mr. President, I have not heard the statement of the Secretary of War referred to, who, in his testimony before the committee, said that a large number of the lines which have been established by the Signal Corps may now be given up; that they are not needed for military purposes but are merely commercial. Those, of course, are in Cuba and Porto Rico, and there are some in this country. There is little danger of any kind that the War Department will not ask for men enough in every staff corps. This corps is like all the others. The chief was before us, and the chiefs of every corps were before us, and every one of them asked for an increase, and of course they bring pressure to bear.

One other point——

Mr. BATE. Pardon me. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him there? Do I understand him to say that they have accomplished what is necessary in the Philippines? They have four hundred and odd posts there. Does the Senator say that there is at any post a sufficient number or any number whatever of this corps?

Mr. PROCTOR. I said nothing whatever about the Philippines.

Mr. BATE. I understood you to say it.

Mr. PROCTOR. I was speaking of other lines.

Mr. BATE. Very well; I was mistaken.

Mr. PROCTOR. I was speaking of Porto Rico and Cuba and some in this country.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator from Vermont allow me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. PROCTOR. In just a moment. The Senate committee heard all the chiefs of corps, and the original report was precisely the same as the report of the committee in the House. The increase as it appears in the bill as it came from the House was made on the floor of the House. Our report is precisely the same in numbers as the report of the committee in the House. We have, since the report was made, added 50 first-class privates. Now I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FORAKER. What I wanted to ask the Senator, and will ask him before he concludes, if he will allow me, is whether or not the provision here made exceeds the present organization, the present number of officers and men in the service connected with the Signal Corps. The Senator spoke about increasing the corps. I do not understand that there is any increase proposed by this measure, but the corps as at present organized has all the officers and all the men.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, that is not correct. The brigadier-general remains as at present provided by law. There is one colonel provided by the House and two lieutenant-colonels.

Mr. FORAKER. How many lieutenant-colonels have they now?

Mr. CARTER. But one.

Mr. ELKINS. One lieutenant-colonel and 3 majors.

Mr. CARTER. At the present time there is but 1 major. We provide 3 majors by the bill. At the present time there are but 4 captains. We provide 9 captains by the bill.

Mr. FORAKER. Are there any additional captains in the Volunteer Signal Corps?

Mr. CARTER. No, sir; there are first and second lieutenants in the volunteer force. We have at present 3 first lieutenants, and we provide by the bill for 9 first lieutenants. I believe that the increase in this corps is quite as emphatic as in any other branch, and more, indeed, in proportion than in any other branch of the service.

Mr. FORAKER. Now, if the Senator will explain one other point to me, it will be made very clear, perhaps. At the end of the section as reported by the Military Committee there is a provision that 10 volunteer signal officers with the rank of first lieutenant and 10 volunteer signal officers with the rank of second lieutenant shall be continued during the present emergency. They are in the Signal Service already?

Mr. SEWELL. They are in already, and in addition to these.

Mr. FORAKER. So when you speak of increasing the number of captains or the number of lieutenants, you mean in the regular service, not an increase beyond the number already in the corps?

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, it is no creation or organization of a corps, but rather the old organization. Every grade of officer and of noncommissioned officer and of men that is called for in this amendment exists now. It is only the question of a slight increase, such as I have indicated. They have majors there now and they have eight or nine hundred men. Why not let it conform to your Army organization? You have three majors in every infantry regiment, one for each battalion. They do not ask to be organized into battalions or anything like that, but we should take the organization, as I suggested, of the Engineer Corps simply by companies, with a colonel.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Tennessee as to his amendment. The Signal Corps made a great record in the late war. It is evident to everyone who has given any thought to this subject that it has become a necessary arm of the service, and it ought to be encouraged. It has as many men in it as the Engineer Corps, and it should be officered equally in order to bring up the corps to the highest state of efficiency. I believe in giving the increase provided in the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, there are but 760 men in the Signal Corps outside of the officers, and for the 760 men we provide 3 majors. There would be only 2 in the line of the Army; that is, in the cavalry. We provide 9 captains for 760 men; we provide 9 first lieutenants; and I challenge any Senator to go through the bill and find a more highly officered body in the service at present or in contemplation than the Signal Corps.

The Senator from Tennessee would increase the number of men to 910. The 910 men, according to his amendment, would be controlled by 1 general, 2 colonels, 2 lieutenant-colonels, 5 majors, 19 captains, and 19 first lieutenants. I can not conceive of anything more nearly approaching a load of hay than that in the line of officers. Mr. President, it really becomes ridiculous, unless you want to have all the work of the Signal Corps performed by officers.

Mr. BATE. If the Senator wants to run this into ridicule, he does it at the expense of the sentiment expressed here by the General Commanding the Army and at the expense of General MacArthur, who is commanding where the Signal Corps is most needed. General MacArthur says these officers are necessary, and he asks that the number be doubled and trebled.

Mr. CARTER. But, Mr. President, we double and treble——

Mr. BATE. I say it is a very small increase that is asked. You say you give them three majors.

Mr. CARTER. In place of one.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, those majors belong to it now by virtue of the volunteer organization. The bill does not give them to it; they belong to it, as do all these field officers, except two, I believe.

Mr. ELKINS. It is plain that the Signal Service needs more officers. I will say in reply to the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] that it is a distinct part of the Army and that the increase asked for is needed. In carrying out that kind of service more officers are required than in any other branch of the Army—the engineers, the artillery, the cavalry, or the infantry—and so the point of the Senator is not well taken. The necessity for this increase is known and, as the Senator from Tennessee says, it is recommended and has the emphatic indorsement of the general commanding the Army and the head of the corps. It requires more intelligent men than do other branches of the Army.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE].

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not understand whether the committee agreed to the insertion of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], striking out certain words.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to strike out, on page 33, line 11, the words "not beyond July 1, 1902."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 33, newly numbered section 20, line 11, after the word "necessary," it is proposed to strike out "not beyond July 1, 1902."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LODGE in the chair). The amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] is next in order, and will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 2, on page 12, beginning in line 17, it is proposed to strike out:

Provided, That the President, in his discretion, may increase the number of corporals in any troop of cavalry to 8, and the number of privates to 76.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, that is one of three amendments all to a similar effect, and each having the same design. There is a similar amendment as to each branch of the service—the artillery, the cavalry, and the infantry—and it is to meet the feature in the bill which gives the President the arbitrary power to increase the Army.

I think that this matter at this point ought to have the careful attention of the committee, to see whether or not there is now clearly expressed that which seemed to be in doubt, at least in the minds of some Senators, on the first day that we had this discussion.

The Senate will remember that questions were asked as to what was the effect of the phraseology of this bill; first, as to the right of the President to reduce the Army; and whether, after having so reduced the Army, the power, as originally suggested by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] was exhausted, or whether, after having reduced it, the President could again increase it, or whether there was any power in him at all to reduce it. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], if I recollect correctly, called the attention of the Senate to that inquiry, and I do not think it was satisfactorily answered. Thereupon the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] asked the committee to point out where was the particular phraseology in the bill which would empower the President to reduce the Army.

These particular amendments, acted upon by themselves, probably will not effect the purpose I have in view. I should be very glad if, before these amendments are acted upon, the Senators in charge of the bill would clear up the questions which seemed to be, as I have said, in doubt, at least in the minds of some Senators, and let us know clearly what is the power of the President under the present phraseology of the bill with reference to the power to reduce, in the first place, and with reference thereafter to the power to increase, and whether that is a continuing power which will enable the President, so long as this act remains on the statute books, to reduce, in his discretion, the Army, in round numbers, from 100,000 to some fifty-odd thousand; and again, in his discretion and without any further authorization from Congress, to increase it from fifty-odd thousand to 100,000 men?

I think, Mr. President, the propriety of a clear exposition of the bill in this regard will be recognized by everyone at this time.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, there can be no doubt whatever, I think, that this increase is limited to the present exigencies. If the Senator would like to have stricken out the words he has referred to, which were under discussion and which read something like this: "or until Congress shall otherwise direct," I am sure there will be no objection.

Mr. BACON. I do not think that that cures the difficulty or meets the inquiry.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question, not by way of antagonizing at all the amendment?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. There is a minimum and a maximum limit provided by this bill for the different organizations or branches of the Army. The minimum would make an Army of fifty-odd thousand and the maximum an Army of 100,000, if you please. Of course, if there is to be any flexibility at all in the organization, there should be a maximum and a minimum limit, and that limit is found in the language which the Senator's amendment proposes to eliminate. If the Senator will turn again to section 26, on page 37, if this language does not plainly authorize the President——

Mr. BACON. The Senator must have a different print from what I have.

Mr. SPOONER. It is the section renumbered 26, the old number of which was 32.

Mr. BACON. All right; I have that.

Mr. SPOONER. I agree with the Senator that it should be made plain—for that is the evident intention of the bill—that the President shall have the power to reduce the Army; and it seems to me that the language of the section is susceptible of no other interpretation. It reads:

That the President is authorized to maintain the enlisted force of the several organizations of the Army at their maximum strength as fixed by this act during the present exigencies of the service.

Now, does it not inevitably and logically follow from that language that when, in the opinion of the President, the present exigencies of the service have passed, he is not authorized to maintain the Army at its maximum limit, and therefore he is authorized to reduce it? I have not been able to give effect to that language unless it carries clear authority to the President to reduce the Army from the maximum to the minimum.

Mr. BACON. I will ask the Senator if he does not think that, in a matter so grave as this, the purpose ought to be plainly expressed in the statute and not be left to inference as to the power of the President?

Mr. SPOONER. I think it is plainly expressed; but if the Senator can make that language plainer, I shall be in favor of voting with him, and I suppose every Senator here is in favor of that. Unless it should be construed as an authorization of the President to reduce the Army when the emergency shall have passed, there is no flexibility in it.

Mr. BACON. The question I want to suggest to the Senator is this: The particular amendment which is under consideration is one that looks not to the question of reduction, but to the question of the power of the President to increase the Army from fifty-odd thousand to 100,000.

It will be conceded, Mr. President, that the language of the section just read by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] is such that the President, independently of any other provision of the bill, would be authorized to enlist an army of 100,000 men; and if, under what the Senator says is the plain meaning of this section, the President would be further authorized—in fact, be under the duty and obligation—to decrease it to the minimum in case of the disappearance of this emergency. But, after the particular language which I am asking the Senate to strike out is eliminated, will the President have the right, in his discretion, at any time to increase the Army again to the maximum?

Mr. SPOONER. I should think not.

Mr. BACON. That is the sole purpose of the amendment now before the Senate.

Mr. SPOONER. Your amendment?

Mr. BACON. I understand from the language in the twenty-sixth section that, independent of the power expressed in the language which my amendment seeks to strike out, the President would have the right to enlist 100,000 men. I think the Senator will agree with me in that.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. BACON. Therefore, independently of the power of the President, in his discretion, to increase the Army to 100,000 men, these portions are not necessary, for the President now has 100,000 men; but they will empower him, if I construe the bill correctly, hereafter, at any time while this act stands upon the statute book, to increase the Army to 100,000.

Mr. SPOONER. There should be a maximum in each branch of the service, as to each cavalry company, each artillery company, and each infantry company.

Mr. BACON. I will grant that.

Mr. SPOONER. There should be a maximum limit prescribed. As I understand this section, I am disposed to agree with the Senator that if the words "until such time as Congress may otherwise hereafter direct" be stricken out and the present emergency passes it seems to me clear that the President would be authorized to reduce the Army. I am not sure that the section is as it ought to be, because in vacation it might happen that when the present exigencies have passed there might be—I can see no reason to suppose there would be—but there might be an apparent approaching exigency, which would render it, in the interest of the country, improper for the President to be compulsorily required to immediately reduce the Army to the minimum. There ought to be some flexibility in the law, because the purpose is plain, and the limit is a perfectly plain one. But the President ought to be at liberty, I think, to protect the interests of the country in the event of another emergency.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me, by section 26 of the bill as renumbered, the President is authorized to maintain the Army at its maximum strength during the existing emergency. Then, if the emergency passes away, the implication is, so far as this section is concerned, that he is to reduce it, because his authority is limited to this exigency.

When you go back to a previous section of the bill you find that it is provided that as to the artillery, the cavalry, the infantry, and the engineers, as to each branch of the service, the President may, in his discretion, increase the number from the minimum to the maximum.

For instance, he may need more cavalry than the minimum strength of that service as provided by this bill, and not need any additional infantry, or any additional artillery, or any additional force in the Engineer Corps. So that the bill has flexibility not only as to the Army as a whole during the present exigency, but as to each and every branch of the service, at the discretion of the President, in view of the exigencies that may hereafter arise. If we should be met with another emergency after the existing one passes away, the President could increase to the full limit of 100,000 men by increasing each and every branch of the service.

Mr. BACON. That is exactly the power I want to deny to the President or to any other man.

Mr. FORAKER. That is a power which I think it is very desirable to have lodged somewhere.

Mr. SPOONER. That is a power which I very much doubt he would possess under this bill as it stands.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Wisconsin will pardon me, I want to suggest to him, in order that the Senate may pass judgment upon the matter, whether or not if it is the sole purpose of these particular portions of the bill to which my amendment is directed to indicate the maximum the language ought not to be changed? Now, instead of striking out particular portions of the bill it might be sufficient to change it so as to read "the maximum numbers shall be the numbers fixed in these particular branches." That would answer the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The Senator from Wisconsin suggested, as I understood him, that, while section 26 authorizes the President to enlist to the maximum, perhaps there is no other place, except in this particular place, where the maximum is mentioned, if I correctly state the Senator's position. So, instead of these particular portions specifically authorizing the President to increase to that number, the authority to enlist to the maximum being elsewhere, it will meet all the necessities at this particular place to specify what shall be the maximum.

Mr. SPOONER. If the amendment were adopted, there would be no maximum fixed by law.

Mr. BACON. With the permission of the Senate, I will ask that the amendment which I have suggested may be passed over, in order that I may frame an amendment to meet the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not know whether I correctly understood the Senator from Georgia, but if I did, I want to say that in each of these places to which I have referred—that is, as to the infantry, the artillery, the cavalry, etc.—the minimum and maximum are specified, and the aggregate minimum of these branches of the service is proposed to be 58,000.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, I wish he would refer to page 12, where one of these clauses ought to be stricken out. The Senator will find this language as to the cavalry arm in line 11:

> Each troop of cavalry shall consist of 1 captain, 1 first lieutenant, 1 second lieutenant, 1 first sergeant, 1 quartermaster-sergeant, 6 sergeants, 6 corporals, 2 cooks, 2 farriers and blacksmiths, 1 saddler, 1 wagoner, 2 trumpeters, and 43 privates.

Mr. FORAKER. That is the minimum.

Mr. BACON. Hold on a moment. The maximum is not expressed in the same language. It is stated that the maximum shall be the number thereinafter expressed; and in addition to expressing what the maximum shall be, it gives authority to the President to raise to the maximum. The authority to enlist the full number is given in section 26, so that the retention of the authority in this particular paragraph is not needed; and the only thing necessary to meet the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin is that that particular paragraph shall be so changed in phraseology as to correspond with the preceding clause and, as the minimum is expressed in the preceding clause, to go on in this clause and express what shall be the maximum.

Mr. FORAKER. It would necessarily follow that when the limitation making the increase is expressed as to the maximum, we can not increase beyond that.

Mr. BACON. That would be the maximum.

Mr. FORAKER. That is the maximum.

Mr. BACON. Necessarily so.

Mr. FORAKER. That is in the body of the bill. The section which the Senator read provides for a certain number of enlisted men, a certain number of privates, as the minimum. Then in the proviso it says:

> Provided, That the President, in his discretion, may increase the number of corporals in any troop of cavalry to 8, and the number of privates to 76, but the total number of enlisted men authorized for the whole Army shall not at any time be exceeded.

That is to say, he may increase each and every arm of the service, except that in the aggregate there shall not be more than the total number fixed for the Army.

Mr. BACON. I will ask the Senator in charge of the bill to insert the provision which is found in section 26, so that it will read:

> Provided, That the President during the present emergencies of the service, in his discretion, etc.

In other words, it would limit the power to increase during the present emergency, so that the President may enlist the Army up to the maximum, and it would not be a continuing power thereafter, existing so long as this act remains upon the statute book.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, I have not occupied the time of the Senate in the discussion of this bill. So far as the organization of the Army is concerned, very much of it is technical, and, unless a person is more familiar with it than I am, it is not easily understood; but one thing, I think, I can understand, and would be glad to say a word about.

I have none of the fear, none of the doubt, none of the trouble which is suggested with relation to an increase of the Army or the maintenance of the Army at 100,000 men. I can not help thinking that all this talk about a great standing army, which is limited in any event and in any emergency to 100,000 men, is uncalled for and is not based upon any sound principle. If I understand this bill, it provides for an organization of the Army which, at least, shall amount to some fifty-odd thousand men—54,000, perhaps—and that is the standing army which is authorized by the bill, with the power given to the President, in his discretion, to increase it to 100,000, or 98,000, perhaps.

Mr. President, that could not do this country any harm. That is not a menace to our liberties.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Yes.

Mr. BERRY. Do I understand the Senator to state that the meaning of the bill is that when the present emergency shall have passed and the Army is reduced to a minimum, thereafter the President can again increase it to 100,000 men without further legislation by Congress?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I fear, Mr. President, that that is not the provision of the bill. I think it ought to be the provision in this bill that at any time——

Mr. BERRY. You think it is not so now?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I fear it is not.

Mr. BERRY. Then it ought to be made plain.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think this bill ought to provide that the President may at any time, in his discretion, increase this Army by directing enlistments up to 100,000 men. Fifty-four thousand men are not more than are required for what may be called police duty in the United States, for manning our posts, our garrisons, our coast defenses, and preserving order in our new possessions. I do not think that 54,000 men are sufficient for that purpose.

What harm can come from having the power given to the President to increase the Army above 54,000 men, up to a point which in his judgment the interests of this country, its best interests and its welfare, require?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Five hundred thousand men, if necessary?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. One hundred thousand men.

I am astonished that Senators express their fears here that the President of the United States would exercise that power, if given to him, for any purpose except for the best interests and the best welfare of the United States. I do not wish, Mr. President, to see the time—I probably shall not live to see it—I do not wish to see the time when we shall be both unprepared to meet any emergency and there shall be no power to make that preparation.

I am not going into the question of probabilities as to whether we shall have additional wars, as to whether we shall have outbreaks which we can not now foresee in our own territories that will require an addition to our Army above 54,000 men; but I think the time will come, and it seems to me that the power to provide for such an emergency can be safely lodged in the hands of the President of the United States. If it can be, it ought to be provided for. This Government ought not to be crippled in its power to preserve order, or meet attacks, or meet any emergency, unless for the gravest reasons. I think 100,000 men is a limit which may properly be fixed upon; but to say that when this present exigency has passed—nobody knows what that means—there shall only be men enough in the Regular Army to man our coast defenses and our garrisons I think is very short-sighted policy.

Does any Senator believe that any President, the present Executive or any President who may be elected, would use this power to destroy the liberties of the people? Mr. President, any such suggestion seems to me to be little better than the expression of a delusion. We need, as was said by the Senator from Massachusetts now in the chair [Mr. LODGE], to be always prepared for emergencies. It is not only a very costly thing for the Government to be unprepared, not only very costly in dollars and cents, but it is very costly in many other ways.

I do not for a moment yield to any man in my admiration for a volunteer force; but when the Government is called upon to meet an emergency and has only men enough in the Regular Army to do post duty and garrison duty and to man our coast defenses and our Army posts, and is obliged to resort to volunteers, it is not only a most expensive proceeding at first, but it will very often place the country in peril. You can not call for and organize a volunteer army in a minute. It takes time. When organized, when properly drilled, when made efficient, it becomes the best army in the world. But there is always a time between the happening of an emergency or the prospect of an emergency and the time when that volunteer army can be made efficient when we are at the mercy of any power that may attack us.

Now, the wisest policy, the soundest judgment, and the best interests of the United States require, in my judgment, that while our Army is maintained by law at a number which will enable us to meet the requirements of the most peaceful times, there should be an opportunity to enlarge that Army if danger threatens the United States; and that power may be safely lodged in the hands of the President of the United States.

Mr. President, we have never had a President in the United States who could be open to the suspicion of increasing the Army for his own aggrandizement or for any purpose except for the best interests of the United States; and we shall never have such a President. When a President is elected and is installed who wants to destroy the liberties of this people, statutes will not prevent it; but we shall never have such a President. Senators may safely trust the present Executive, and any Executive to whom this power shall be intrusted, to use it wisely, to use it judiciously, to use it patriotically.

I much prefer that that power shall be lodged in the hands of the President than to run the risk that at some future and unforeseen time this country will be caught in a position where it will have nobody to fight its battles and will be obliged to rely upon volunteers, which are to be called for, slowly recruited, slowly organized, and only efficient when the great injury has been done.

I had very much rather strike out the words "during the present exigencies of the service" than to strike out the words "or until such time as Congress shall hereafter direct." What do those words mean? What are the present exigencies of the service? When are they to cease? Are they wholly to cease or partially to cease? Can the President maintain the strength of the Army at a hundred thousand men, or thereabouts, until he thinks that the present exigencies have ceased? How is he to construe those words? Under what circumstances is he to suppose and determine that the present exigencies continue? What are the present exigencies of the service?

You say, perhaps, until peace is restored in the Philippines. But how restored? How completely restored? Do these words authorize the President to maintain the organization of the Army above 54,000 men if soldiers are only required in the Philippines and in Porto Rico and elsewhere as a peace force, as a police force? If the enemy lay down its arms, can we safely withdraw all of our men from the Philippines? Do the words "the present exigencies of the service" mean that when there is no longer armed and active resistance to the United States the troops are to be withdrawn from the Philippine Islands? Is that the meaning of those words? Will the President after that have no power and no authority to maintain our Army at a higher rate than 54,000 when fully that number is required at home?

The enlistments in the Army are, as I understand, for three years, and practically one-third of the Army goes out by operation of law at the end of each year. One-third of the enlisted men disappear from the Army at the end of each year by reason of the expiration of their terms of service. If the Army is maintained for the present at 100,000 or thereabouts, it will be reduced in that way to 66,666 men within a year by the operation of law.

Now, do Senators wish a bill passed here which, within twelve months from this time, no matter what the exigencies may be, is to prevent the President from having more than 66,000 available men. It seems to me that this matter may well be left to Congress. Congress always appropriates for the pay of that number of enlisted men and officers which it deems important to keep in the Army at the time the appropriation is made. The legal limit of the Army now is 30,000, or was for many years previous to the Spanish war. I think the legal Army was established in 1872 as 30,000.

Mr. ALLISON. Eighteen hundred and seventy.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. In 1870 at 30,000. We have nearly doubled our population since that time. I do not know but that we have quite doubled it. If we were to provide absolutely for an army of 60,000 men more, we should provide no more proportionately and for not so much of an army proportionately, considering the new circumstances which surround us, as Congress provided for thirty years ago.

Since that time we have acquired new possessions; we have felt curselves obliged to provide elaborate coast defenses; we have greater use for an Army now in proportion to our population, with no war, with no fighting, than we had thirty years ago, when we established the legal limit of the Army at 30,000, and yet Congress has not appropriated for the whole 30,000 men. I do not know just the number that Congress appropriated for prior to the breaking out of the Spanish war, but I do know——

Mr. COCKRELL. Twenty-five thousand from the Forty-fourth Congress up.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Twenty-five thousand. I am obliged to the Senator from Missouri, who gives me the dates. From the Forty-fourth Congress up to the time of the breaking out of the Spanish war Congress appropriated for only 25,000 men.

Now, leave the discretion in the hands of the President. Just have a little confidence in the President. Believe he is an honest man and a patriotic man, and that he is not going to use any power that may be given him for any dishonest or unpatriotic purposes. Leave the power in the hands of the President of the United States to increase the Army as any exigency may require, and then leave it to Congress not to appropriate for more men than are required at any particular time.

It seems to me that that is the wisest thing to do, Mr. President. If we could just eliminate politics and arguments for political effect from this Chamber for one day I think there would be a unanimous agreement upon the proposition that we ought to have some flexibility to our Army, that we ought not to limit it to the barest requirements of peace, with no possibility of enlarging it when trouble comes upon us, and when the exigencies of a threatened war require its enlargement in order to defend and protect the country.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I quite agree with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] that the words "during the present exigencies" ought not to be in this bill. In other words, I do not think that the question as to whether the Army should be a large or a small army should be in the determination of the President, nor do I think that the question of the increase of the Army or the decrease of the Army should be in the discretion of the President. I think that is the duty of Congress. I think it is proper that we should do now as we did two years ago, ourselves judge of the probable duration of the emergency.

Two years ago we were confronted by the requirement for a large army in the Philippine Islands. Congress provided that army, and Congress properly judged for itself as to the duration of the emergency, and raised an army for two years. It may have been a mistake as to the time, but it is the duty of Congress to provide the Army, and it is the duty of Congress to exercise its best judgment in determining for what length of time this increased Army shall continue to exist.

Mr. President, I think we have fallen upon an evil day when a Senator can rise in his place in this Chamber and say that he thinks objections to giving to the President of the United States the power to raise armies at his pleasure are uncalled for. I think that was the language of the Senator. I think we have fallen upon an evil day when the Senator not only says that himself, but when he reflects the opinion of the dominant party of the country, because I think if there is anything that should be cherished by any liberty-loving people, it is the principle and the practice of having the representatives of the people determine what shall be the size of the army and when it shall be increased and when it shall be decreased.

Mr. President, if what the Senator from Connecticut says is true, why do we have all the restrictions that are found in the Constitution of the United States as to the exercise of power, either by the President or by the Congress? Is it to be assumed that when the Constitution makers were engaged in framing the Constitution they had more reason to distrust the fidelity and patriotism of the men to whom the new Government was to be committed than we have to distrust those men to-day; or, on the contrary, was it true that they recognized the fact that laws should be made not as related to those who should be intrusted with power being altogether good men, but should be made so that even if a bad man got into power he could not abuse it?

Mr. President, if it were possible to have a man who should be all-wise as a ruler, if it should be possible to have a man who would be absolutely honest, absolutely capable, absolutely faithful, the best of all governments would be an autocracy, because that man would do the best, he would do no wrong, and no machinery of government which could be provided would possibly be an improvement upon what he could do. But as men are frail, as they are imperfect, as they are not all-wise, as sometimes bad men get into power, it is found necessary that restrictions shall be thrown around the power of those who may be placed in position.

Mr. President, when the framers of the Constitution got together they had but recently rid themselves of one-man power, and throughout the Constitution there is evidence of the fact that the controlling, dominant wish was that there should be no exercise of one-man power in this country. If you will look through the Constitution you will find that almost all powers of government are intrusted not to the Executive, but to Congress, and among all the powers which the history of our race in its struggles showed the greatest necessity of controlling were the powers to raise armies, the powers of making war. Where does the Senator find anywhere in the framework of the Constitution anything which looks to the exercise of power by the Executive of the Government to raise armies and to determine what shall be the size of the armies?

Mr. President, we are engaged in the details of this bill. Of course, all desire, if it shall pass, that it shall be made as perfect as possible, but we do not lose sight of the fact that however perfect in its details, this bill, in its passage, will mark an epoch in the history of the United States. Senators may scoff at it, but it is none the less true that the passage of a bill by which there shall be authorized a standing army of 100,000 men, and by which the President of the United States shall, in his own judgment, and without control, be allowed to determine within a range of 50,000 men what shall be the size of that Army, is a march to empire.

Mr. President, it is a great revolution that is proposed. I did not expect to go into a discussion of this matter, but the Senator from Connecticut, in what he said, makes it necessary. It is a great revolution which will be effected when this bill is put upon the statute books. If there is one thing above all others which has distinguished the peculiar spirit of this Government, it has been that which has rested the military power of this Government upon the volunteer system, and which has discountenanced anything like a large standing army.

I do not wish anything I say to be considered as unfavorable to our standing army as we have had it, because we have had no large standing army. It has been a small Army. It has been one which has been regarded with favor and with pride by the American people. It has never been large enough to be a burden. It has never been large enough to threaten us with militarism. It has simply been an Army which has been regarded the type for the emulation of our volunteer troops, an Army which should be a nucleus around which should rally that great host of volunteers whenever the necessity called for the defense of the country. But the evident purpose of this bill is to eliminate for all time the volunteer system from the military organization of this country and to establish in lieu of it a great regular army.

Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], I think it was, on the first day of this discussion spoke of the volunteer system, which we had been accustomed to rely upon in the past, and which we had endeavored to make of use in the American-Spanish war, and he spoke of it as a mistake which we would never repeat. In other words, that for the future we should rely upon regular troops and not upon volunteer troops. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] on a subsequent day spoke of the necessity, as the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] has to-day, of an elastic system of Regular Army, by which I suppose is meant that when a military force is needed, it will not be necessary to call upon the volunteers, but that the Regular Army can be so expanded as to meet the necessities of the case.

I repeat, Mr. President, that whenever the system in this country is changed from the volunteer system of republican government, as we have had it, to the regular system which obtains in the continental governments of Europe, it will mark a great epoch in the history of this country. It is but one step. It is not the last step. If it be true, as Senators have said here, that the Regular Army is so much more to be desired, if it be true that the employment of volunteers is a mistake, then we are to have an utter change, and in the place of this reserve army of volunteers we are to have the framework of a Regular Army which is to be expanded as necessity may require. While these voluntary organizations—the National Guard, as they are called—are still to keep up their organization, they are to have no more to do with the actual service in war than the little boys who parade the streets in paper caps and with wooden guns.

But without going into that, Mr. President, we are going back to the distinct question raised here to-day, whether or not it is the proper policy of this Government that when troops are needed Congress should be assembled and should authorize the raising of troops, or whether, on the contrary, the system shall be adopted by which the President of the United States shall at his discretion and in his will determine within a range of fifty-odd thousand men what shall be the size of the American Army.

Mr. HARRIS. And the necessity for it.

Mr. BACON. And the necessity for it, as is suggested by the Senator from Kansas.

The Senator from Connecticut says it is a mere matter of politics. Is it a mere matter of politics to insist that according to the spirit and theory of our Government it is a question which ought to be determined by Congress and ought not to be left to any man? Mr. President, the Senator asked whether or not we distrust the President. I do not put it upon that ground at all. When the Constitution of the United States was framed it was known who was going to be the first President. It was known that Washington was going to be the President—the idol of the people, the Father of the Country, as he was even then called; and yet all these restrictions were thrown around him. Would the Senator say that that was distrusting Washington, or would he say that the framers of the Constitution were endeavoring to embed in our system of government and in our organic law those principles which were found necessary for the preservation of the liberties of the people and of the free institutions which they had won at so great a sacrifice?

Mr. President, the issue is not to be evaded—shall it be in the future the province of the President of the United States to raise armies without the command and authority of Congress, or shall it be in the future, as it has been in the past, whenever there has been a necessity of this kind, the province of Congress to determine it? We are not on the eve of any political contest, that any question of this kind should be raised as a matter of politics. If the Senator thinks it is a mere matter of politics to object to a great standing army, he is mistaken.

If he thinks it is a mere matter of politics to desire that the spirit of our Government shall be maintained in this law to the extent that the Executive, I care not who he may be or how pure he may be, shall not have the power to determine as to when an army shall be raised and what shall be the size of it, he is mistaken. There is such a thing as honesty in the expression of one's opinion of a principle, outside of a mere political exigency. There is such a thing as adherence to that principle by one honestly, and not simply as a matter of political advantage.

I wish to say to the Senator that for myself I would rather see the party to which I belong condemned to universal and never-ending banishment from political power than to see ingrafted upon the statutes of the country the principle that the President of the United States shall be allowed to determine when the Army shall be raised and what shall be the size of it. And it is no sufficient answer to say that he must in reason always have some power in the enlistment of men when the number drops below that which is authorized. It is no sufficient answer to say that that establishes the principle. While it might be a small matter and no infraction of principle in the case of a thousand men, it is a large matter and an infraction of principle when it comes to 50,000 men, because the number of 1,000 men may necessarily be fluctuating to some extent.

It is impossible to have it otherwise. It is in the necessities of the case that there should be those fluctuations around and about the point of maximum. But when it comes to 50,000 men there is no such necessity, and consequently the principle which does not attach in the one case does attach in the other. If it be true that the question of numbers cuts no figure; if it be true that it makes no difference, so far as the principle is concerned, whether the fluctuation is 300 men or 50,000 men, then we could very easily rid ourselves of all trouble by making the maximum 1,000,000 men and by saying that the President may, in his judgment and in his discretion, enlist just such a number, short of that maximum, as he shall see fit.

Mr. President, I wish to repeat here (I may not have the opportunity to do it again), I do not oppose this Army because of the size of it so far as the same may be shown to be at present needed, and for the reasons I have already stated in this debate, I am ready to vote now, as I did two years ago, for an Army of 100,000 men to be used by the President, as the Commander in Chief of the Army. But I am not willing to go further. While this Army may be needed now, and while I am ready to vote for it for two or even three years on account of the present emergency, I am not willing to say it shall be increased to 100,000 not for two or for three years, but for all time.

Mr. President, it is with reference to this particular issue that the amendments have been introduced. The Senators on the other side themselves differ as to whether, when the number has once been reduced, the President has the power to increase the Army to the maximum. Some say that as often as it is reduced he will have the power to increase. Others say that when once reduced the power is gone.

I do not think it is necessary, in view of section 26, that these sections should remain, and it is for the purpose of denying to the President (not because of the present occupant of that office, but regardless of who may occupy that office) the exercise of the great power of determining when an army shall be raised and what shall be its numbers that I offer these amendments.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I should like to say a word on this matter, because it seems to me that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] overlooks the great constitutional security we have in regard to the dealings with the Army by the Executive and forgets a very recent and most pregnant instance of the effect of that security.

I suppose that the policy of this bill is in accordance with the previous policy of the country. Everybody knows, I suppose, and, if anyone does not, I have taken great pains to make it known, that I am opposed to the purpose to which it is proposed to put the Army of the United States when organized under the bill, and I do not expect to vote for the bill, but I do not find the difficulty with it which troubles the honorable Senator from Georgia, as he does not seem to be troubled by the difficulty which troubles me.

He says that it has been hitherto the policy of the United States to have the Army kept at a small number, where it can not be increased without the authority of Congress to any considerable extent, and where, from its small size—25,000 or 30,000 men—it is no menace to public liberty. That, I think, will be the condition of things, as far as that is concerned, after this bill goes into effect.

There is a careful limit established beyond which it is impossible that there should be any injury or danger to our domestic liberties by this force. Our Army of 100,000 men, if it be raised, will not, in my judgment, make the Executive more formidable than the Army of 25,000 men made him when that number was fixed. We have doubled or trebled our population, but we have still more largely increased the territory to be covered, the necessity for defense of a vast coast, and the outlying positions. I do not speak now of the Philippines at all, but the outlying positions to be defended; and a foreign enemy is five times nearer us for all practical purposes. The distance has been diminished five times in the progress of events since we had the Army established at 25,000 men.

Practically, I regard this measure as not an authority to the President to increase a Regular Army beyond the number fixed by Congress. It is practically a fixing by Congress of a point far within the limit of domestic safety to liberty at home and far within that limit authorizing the President to reduce it still further. So if that were the only difficulty in the bill, it is a difficulty that would not trouble me at all.

Now, in addition to that, which is security enough, we have our constitutional security, on which the practice of Congress has improved. The Constitution says that there shall be no appropriation for an army which shall extend beyond two years; and the practice long established (I suppose established from the beginning, though I am not sure about that) is to make no appropriation which extends above twelve months. So the purpose to which an army can be used is also within the power of the two Houses of Congress, and the Executive can never put an army for a period of more than twelve months to a purpose which either House of Congress disapproves, because his appropriation will be cut off.

We have had a memorable instance of the effect of that constitutional provision in this country. I did not like what happened at all, but I thought the Executive did just right; and I not only thought he did just right, but so far as my humble influence went I urged him that he ought to do, and that it was his sworn constitutional duty to do, exactly what he did.

President Hayes was inaugurated in the President's chair on the 4th day of March, 1877. There had been a hostile House of Representatives for the past two years, and a hostile House of Representatives had been elected for the next two years. President Grant lawfully and constitutionally, as I think, used the military power of the Government to uphold the Republican governors in Louisiana and South Carolina, whom the Republican party claimed, and I believe truly, to be the lawful governors of those States.

Mr. BACON. What does the Senator mean by a hostile House of Representatives?

Mr. HOAR. I mean a House of Representatives of a different political party; that is, an unfriendly party—another party.

Mr. TILLMAN. Were they not constitutionally elected, and did they not represent, or were they not supposed to represent, the people?

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will listen to the point I make, he will see nothing in the least to suggest those questions, as I will show before I get through.

There was a House of Representatives which did not believe that Mr. Packard, in Louisiana, and Mr. Chamberlain, in South Carolina, were lawful governors, and they did not believe there was any right on the part of the Executive to put them in power by the military arm against the contention of their opponents in those States. Now, two days or thereabouts before the President was inaugurated the Army appropriation bill came up in the House of Representatives and was defeated, and it is notorious that the House of Representatives defeated that bill because a majority did not mean that use of the troops should be made any longer.

Now, when President Hayes came into power I believed, and I think I know that he believed religiously, that Chamberlain and Packard were the lawful governors of those States, that they had been honestly elected, and that the objection to them was not the objection of a majority of the people, although the opponents were persons who had the organized force and power to do what they wanted there. He refused, refused for a sound constitutional reason, to continue the policy of keeping those governors in by military force, and his course was fully approved by President Grant, his predecessor. It was a subject of bitter attack on the part of men of his own party.

Mr. President, that operated to secure the right of the House of Representatives, just fresh from the people, to determine that the Government of the United States should not use that power for any purpose they did not approve. Mr. Hayes, of course, if he had seen fit, could have kept up that little exercise of power till the 30th day of the next June, but, instead of that, he preferred to bow to the inevitable and withdraw his military force, with the consequence which everybody remembers.

Now, I suppose the same thing will be true hereafter. If the cloud shall fall from the eyes of my honorable friend from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], as I hope and pray, and he shall see the utter wrong and folly of this Philippine business, and carry Senators enough with him to see it, when an Army bill comes up hereafter, to make a majority, and if the same thing shall happen to the House of Representatives, then this business will stop; and so in regard to any other use of military power, foreign or domestic. I want to have that expression now, and propose to vote for it now, but I am afraid my honorable friend from Georgia will not stand by me in that attempt.

Mr. BACON. What is that?

Mr. HOAR. On the contrary, he says he wishes to give all the power that is necessary to put down these Philippine people.

Mr. BACON. No.

Mr. HOAR. He is in favor of putting them down, as I understand.

Mr. BACON. No; the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. HOAR. If they would only give the force for a limited time, one year or two years, he would vote for an army of 100,000, or any other number.

Mr. BACON. The Senator is mistaken. I hope he will let me correct him, as he has misstated me.

Mr. HOAR. Then I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. BACON. I will state what my proposition is, and I do not think any other Senator in the Chamber misunderstands me, even if the Senator from Massachusetts does. I have announced as emphatically as I could, not only in this debate, but in previous debates, that I am utterly opposed to the policy which has brought on the war in the Philippine Islands and the policy which continues the war in the Philippine Islands. I have announced that I would stop it, and stop it promptly, if I had the power to do it.

But I have said this, and I stand by it (and I think the Senator from Massachusetts ought to occupy the same position), that when a policy has been adopted by the Government, although I opposed it and disapprove of it, which has put an American army on the other side of the globe, which must either maintain itself or fall the prey of those who are fighting against the American arms, however much we may disapprove of that policy, however much we may condemn that policy, however much we may deplore the end sought to be accomplished by that policy, as Senators of the United States we can not sit here and say that that army shall be left a prey to the foe and that we will not send a reenforcement to them.

Mr. HOAR. I agree entirely to that, if that is all the Senator said.

Mr. BACON. That is all.

Mr. HOAR. I thought he went further and said if there was not any danger of the American Army falling a prey to the other side, if they could be peacefully and quietly withdrawn or could stay in absolute safety and security and comfort in the places they were holding, he was still in favor of giving this force——

Mr. BACON. No, Mr. President.

Mr. HOAR. Even if that policy continued.

Mr. BACON. I voted to-day for the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts for a cessation of all that fighting.

Mr. HOAR. But that was a passing remark. I do not want to be diverted. My main proposition is that our liberties and the constitutional power of Congress over such matters are not endangered by this bill. The Constitution has safeguards in it, as far as they are concerned; but in my judgment the one place where the Constitution meant that the House or Senate should record their opinions as to the proper use of the military force by the Executive was when they came to vote on the Army bill, either the Army appropriation bill or such a bill as this. That is what I meant to say. If the Senator from Georgia agrees with me as far as I have stated my views, very well; so much the better.

Therefore I do not oppose this bill myself because it raises a force of 100,000 men, which it authorizes the President to reduce if he thinks fit, or because it has a skeleton of officers ready for an emergency. On the contrary, I agree with my colleague that there is a good deal of danger, that there is a good deal of frown in the attitude of events which may be expected in the future toward this country, without regard to the Philippine Islands, and I put my opposition to this bill solely on that one ground, and I should vote for it but for that.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I do not suppose the Senator from Connecticut in charge of the bill expects that it can be finished to-night, or that perhaps any vote can be taken, and in view of that——

Mr. CARTER. I presume the Senator contemplates a motion to adjourn or to go into executive session?

Mr. HALE. There are matters that ought to be attended to in executive session, as there will be no executive session to-morrow.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, in view of the fact that there will be no session to-morrow and——

Mr. HALE. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. CARTER. In view of the further fact that it is desirable to pass the apportionment bill, to which I believe there is at present no objection, I renew my request for unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12740) making an apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the Twelfth Census.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana, from the Committee on the Census, asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill known as the apportionment bill, which has already been read in full to the Senate.

Mr. PETTUS. It was agreed that that bill should go over until morning.

Mr. HALE. I take it, the reason why the Senator from Montana has asked to take it up now is that it has been found since that there will be no session for any business to-morrow. To-morrow is to be taken up by the eulogies upon the late Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. PETTUS. I think the bill had better go over until morning, Mr. President.

Mr. HOAR. That carries it over until Monday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. SHOUP. I ask unanimous consent to call up Senate joint resolution No. 134, relating to leaves of absence granted officers of the Army, reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, under the advice of my associates I will withdraw any objection that I have made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama withdraws his objection to the request of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. CLAY. I desire to ask the Senator from Montana if he intends to press the bill to passage this evening.

Mr. CARTER. I desire to state, in reply to the Senator from Georgia, that it is very important that the bill should pass at an early date. The legislatures of many of the States are now in session, and will be called upon to redistrict States under the provisions of the bill.

I would not ask present consideration for the bill if it were not for the fact that this emergency exists, or that at least there is a need of haste, and the further fact that all the provisions of the bill have been very thoroughly discussed. It will be recalled by Senators that the debate in the other branch of Congress has been quite prolonged, and that the merits of the various propositions presented were very thoroughly discussed. The bill which is now pending was——

Mr. CLAY. With the Senator's permission, I will state that I am willing to have the bill taken up. I desired to confer with the Representatives from my State before it was passed upon, but I think I can do so this evening. I am willing that it shall be taken up now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE TO ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. SHOUP. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 134) relating to leaves of absence granted officers of the Army.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That leaves of absence which may be granted officers of the Regular or Volunteer Army serving in the Territory of Alaska or the islands of Cuba or Porto Rico or the Philippine Islands, for the purpose of returning thereto, or which may have been granted such officers for such purpose since the 13th day of October, 1898, shall be regarded as taking effect on the date such officers reached or may have reached the United States, respectively, and as terminating, or as having terminated, on the respective dates of their departure from the United States in returning to their commands, as authorized by an order of the Secretary of War, dated October 13, 1898.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. HOAR. I should like to have it explained.

Mr. SHOUP. There is an amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to reserve the right to object until an explanation has been made.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will explain the joint resolution in a very few words. When you give to an officer in the Philippines, for instance, leave for a month to come to the United States, it takes him a month to get here. You had better let him have his leave begin, if he is to have any good of it at all, when he gets to San Francisco, and not have it begin when he leaves Manila.

Mr. BURROWS. That is all there is of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota objects.

JOHN S. MOSBY.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3305) to refer the claim of John S. Mosby against the United States, for the value of certain tobacco, to the Court of Claims. I will make a brief explanation of it.

Mr. HALE. As it is getting late, after that I shall insist on my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill the title of which he has stated, which will be read in full for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of John S. Mosby for the value of 7,900 pounds, more or less, of tobacco mentioned in an official paper dated at Rocketts Landing, Richmond, Va., July 27, 1865, signed W. H. D. Cochran, major, depot quartermaster, and purporting to give a "list of captured tobacco marked in the name of Col. J. S. Mosby, transferred to Col. J. S. Loomis, Treasury agent, June 7, 1865," be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims of the United States, with full jurisdiction to try and adjudicate said claim and render judgment against the United States in such sum as may be found just by said court, without the interposition in behalf of the Government of any bar arising from the existing statutes of limitations. Right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States is expressly reserved to the Government and to the claimant.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

Mr. DANIEL. There is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a report. Does the Senator desire to have it read?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I desire to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. MARTIN April 12, 1900, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3305) to refer the claim of John S. Mosby against the United States, for the value of certain tobacco, to the Court of Claims, have carefully considered the same and recommend that it do pass, with an amendment.

The original receipt given on the 27th day of July, 1865, by the depot quartermaster, at Richmond, Va., after the war had ended, and when Colonel Mosby was a paroled soldier, is appended hereto as a part of this report. We recommend that the bill be amended by adding at the end thereof the words: "But it is provided that any portions of such sum representing tobacco beneficially belonging to the father, sister, or other relatives of said Mosby shall be held by him in trust accordingly."

OFFICE DEPOT QUARTERMASTER, ROCKETTS LANDING,
Richmond, Va., July 27, 1865.

List of captured tobacco, marked in name of Col. J. S. Mosby, transferred to Col. J. S. Loomis, Treasury agent, June 7, 1865.

	Pounds.
5½ boxes May Apples	484
14½ boxes Bill Brandon	1,440
4½ boxes Grant and Nelson	381
2½ boxes Sutherlin	209
1½ boxes Sutherlin	[1] 107
2½ boxes Monticello	[1] 190
1½ boxes Chism	[1] 100
7 cases smoking tobacco	2,100
12 cases smoking tobacco	2,850

WM. H. D. COCHRAN,
Major, Division Quartermaster.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to have the Senator from Virginia explain to us how this tobacco was taken by the United States?

Mr. DANIEL. This tobacco, as I understand, was taken at the depot in Richmond, where it bore the name of Colonel Mosby, on June 7, 1865. Colonel Mosby was well known during the war and is well known now. He was a colonel in the Confederate army and had conducted partisan operations in northern Virginia, and for a little while after it was a question with him as to how he might be treated; but receiving assurances that he would be paroled on the same basis as the soldiers of the Army of Northern Virginia he came in, surrendered, and accepted his parole.

As I understand, Mr. President—and I hope I do not extend the matter by any too favorable interpretation, and, if I do, Senators will correct me—the parole of the Confederate soldiers declared that they took an obligation on their part that they would go home and obey the laws of the United States, and, on the part of the Government, that they should remain unmolested or undisturbed. I believe that implied that they would not be molested in their personal property or by any procedure of war against them.

I think that was their then status. I have in favor of that interpretation the conduct of General Grant, which I think was extremely honorable to him, and I always mention it with pleasure and satisfaction. After General Lee had surrendered there was a movement on the part of the Administration to have him brought before the civil tribunals of the country. General Grant, as history relates, went up to the White House and stated that if any procedure was taken against General Lee he would tender his resignation to the Government as an officer of its Army, regarding any molestation of General Lee as a violation of the parole which he had given him upon the field of battle.

I believe that that parole applies to the property of the soldiers who surrendered in good faith. While I am not seeking—on the contrary, I am avoiding saying anything that might possibly wound the sensibilities of anyone, I believe that good faith on the part of the Government requires that they should respect the obligation that had just been entered into by the soldiers who had arms in their hands and laid them down, and that it was not proper after that to take away from them, by the action of the United States Government, anything that they possessed, unless under due process of law.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator be kind enough to state once more what actually was done affecting this soldier after his parole was accepted?

Mr. DANIEL. His tobacco was taken from him.

Mr. HOAR. Taken from him personally?

Mr. DANIEL. I do not suppose he had it on him, because a man would find it very difficult——

Mr. HOAR. I did not speak of having it on him personally; but was the tobacco taken whilst in his possession?

Mr. DANIEL. I can not state about that, because I do not know.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The bill speaks of it as "captured tobacco."

Mr. DANIEL. I know that. The Government was still capturing things then.

Mr. HOAR. I put my question with a certain point in view, which I will state if the Senator from Virginia is willing I should do so now.

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly; I want the Senator to do so.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose the policy was, when General Lee and the troops under him surrendered, that they were paroled, as the Senator has stated, but the war was not over. The general hostile operations against that territory—capturing cotton, taking strong places, and moving armies across the country, which might trample down a man's field or destroy his house, if it were necessary—did not stop until something like an armistice was declared. If a soldier had anything done to him because of his personal character or quality as a soldier—for instance, if General Lee had been arrested after that parole, General Grant, in his indignation, would have been well warranted in doing what the Senator has stated.

Mr. DANIEL. I think so.

Mr. HOAR. But suppose an army crossing the country had captured a lot of General Lee's cotton, captured abandoned cotton, captured some of his tobacco, or injured his fields, his parole as a soldier would not have given him a right to recover what the inhabitants generally of the territory—still deemed hostile territory under the laws of war—were suffering, and which he suffered as one of them. So, if this man had been stripped of his clothing, of the horse he was riding, or his musket taken from him on the ground that he was a Confederate soldier, it would have been a violation of his parole; but if he suffered from just what other people of his State or region were suffering, he could not have any peculiar title to redress because of that parole. That is the proposition I wish to submit to the Senator.

Mr. DANIEL. I am a very poor judge for the Senator to submit any proposition of that sort to me, for, of course, my sympathy is with the people who were in trouble and distress at that time, and I would not like to be called upon to be a judge.

I know that the war was over. Technically it may not have been, for it did not end, I believe, by proclamation technically until a long time afterwards, but it was over so far as Colonel Mosby was concerned, and it ought to have been over so far as the Government of the United States was concerned. They had settled the business.

I will state as to Colonel Mosby that it was very much desired by the Federal Government to dispose of him and his command. He had the command of a few hundred men, who had rendered very active and very efficient service to the Confederate side, and he deliberated for some weeks, perhaps for a month or two, as to what he should do. On receiving assurances from officers representing the Government that he would be respected as a soldier, he came in and surrendered; and I think that after that time, so far as his soldiership of the Confederacy was concerned, the matter was settled forever. The United States Army was, of course, occupying different places in Virginia, but it had been in the possession of Richmond long before the surrender of Colonel Mosby and some time before the surrender of the Army of Northern Virginia. The United States was not taking generally the property of everybody at that time.

I do not know intimately all the circumstances about this case. I know that the property was taken on the 7th of June, 1865, which was two months after the surrender and some time after Colonel Mosby had handed in his sword.

The Government has got his tobacco, and it seems to me that no Government should desire to be oppressive. When it does extreme acts in war it does them regretfully. No man of honorable feeling likes to do them. He can only do them under the compulsion of some great passion or some great necessity which actuates him to do things against which his better nature recoils.

Even if the Senator were correct in his technical reasoning—I might almost say his hair-splitting views of the law—I believe that his generosity would incline him to wipe them out without refining them too much. There is no old Confederate who has got much out of this Government since the war. They are not a class of people upon whom we ought to draw the reins too severely, anyway.

I hope the Senator will give a little rein to his natural generosity of disposition and let Colonel Mosby have an opportunity to try his right in court. That is all he asks. If, as the Senator says, there are propositions about the matter that may becloud his title or refute his title, all he asks is that the court may pass upon them.

Mr. HOAR. I ask that the bill be read once more, if the Senator is through.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be again read. Has the Senator from Virginia yielded the floor?

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly, for that purpose, Mr. President.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I am going to move that the Senate adjourn, if I can get the floor so that I can make the motion.

Mr. DANIEL. I hope the Senator will not interrupt this bill for a moment longer.

Mr. HOAR. I withdraw the request I made for the reading of the bill.

Mr. DANIEL. I want to say that Colonel Mosby would have had authority under the laws of the United States to have brought his suit but for a peculiar circumstance. A court of Southern Claims was established by Congress, and suits for the recovery of property taken by the Government were authorized to be brought in it. In the law it was provided that no suitor should be heard unless he could take an oath that he had not sympathized with the Confederacy during the war. Of course Colonel Mosby could not do that, and hence he could not sue, but after the time when he might have sued had expired the Supreme Court of the United States held that that clause in the act was unconstitutional.

So he appeared to be barred, and would, in fact, have been barred by the court by an unconstitutional provision. The whole object of this bill is to relieve him from that bar of the statute of limitations. The bill does not decide or undertake to determine the legal questions which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has presented, but simply to remove the bar of the statute of limitations, which was put on Colonel Mosby in such a way that he could hardly get over it.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SPOONER. Let me ask the Senator from South Dakota if he will not change his motion to a motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business?

Mr. HALE. I had a motion pending to go into executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion could hardly be pending.

Mr. HALE. There will be no session to-morrow, I will say to the Senator from South Dakota, except for eulogies, and there are some things that ought to be attended to in executive session to-night. I hope the Senator will withdraw his motion to adjourn, or change it to a motion to go into executive session.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I have been waiting for some one to move to go into executive session. I have no particular interest in an executive session, but I will withdraw the motion to adjourn if the Senate wishes to go into executive session.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HALE. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, January 12, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 11, 1901.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. The Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, we approach Thee in the sacred attitude of prayer because we believe in Thee, that Thou art a God hearing and God answering prayer. Hear us, we beseech Thee, when we commiend to Thee for Thy care all the members of this House who are sick and afflicted with the prevalent disease of the season; and especially, Heavenly Father, we pray Thee to let Thy blessing rest upon the member from Nebraska who for days has been near death's door. We thank Thee for the hope of his recovery and we pray Thee, if it be Thy will, that he may be restored to health; that he may go in and out with us as before. Watch over us this day that we make no mistakes, and Thine be the praise through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. CUNNINGHAM, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 5337. An act providing for the construction of a steam revenue cutter for service in the harbor of Boston, Mass.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of Hon. FRANK G. CLARKE, late a Representative from the State of New Hampshire.

Resolved, That a committee of six Senators be appointed by the presiding officer to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to take order for superintending the funeral of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

And that, in compliance with the foregoing, the Presinent pro tempore had appointed as said committee Mr. CHANDLER, Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. DEBOE, Mr. SCOTT, Mr. MCLAURIN, and Mr. HEITFELD.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 12395. An act to provide for the holding of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the eastern district of Arkansas; and

H. R. 3047. An act to remove charge of desertion from military record of John Faulds, Company G, Thirty-first Wisconsin Infantry.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE W. D. DALY.

Mr. SALMON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that February 9, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, be set aside for tributes of respect to the memory of the late W. D. DALY, a Representative from New Jersey.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that February 9, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, be set apart for eulogies on the late Representative DALY, from New Jersey. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

LOUISIANA PURCHASE CENTENNIAL.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 9829) to provide for celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of the purchase of the Louisiana territory by the United States by holding an international exhibition of the arts, industries, manufactures, and the products of the soil, mine, forest, and sea, in the city of St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, on the Union Calendar, be referred back to the Special Committee on the Centennial of the Louisiana Purchase.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota, the chairman of the Special Committee on the Celebration of the Louisiana Purchase, asks unanimous consent that House bill No. 9829, on the Union Calendar, be referred back to that committee. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ACCOUNTS OF MARSHALS AND CLERKS OF DISTRICT COURTS IN THE TERRITORY OF UTAH.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5231) relating to the accounts of United States marshals and clerks of the district courts of the Territory of Utah.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Utah asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 5231, which is on the Speaker's table.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States marshals and the clerks of the district courts of the Territory of Utah prior to its admission to the Union as a State shall be held accountable only for fees earned in United States cases, in accordance with a decision of the Attorney-General dated December 2, 1891, and all unclosed accounts of such officers shall be settled and closed accordingly.

Mr. DALZELL. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to hear some explanation from the gentleman.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, during the first session of this Congress this bill, under a different number, was introduced both in the House and Senate. It was unanimously reported by the Judiciary Committee in the Senate and came to the House. In the House Judiciary Committee the Senate bill took the place of the House bill and was unanimously reported by that committee, the distinguished member from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] submitting the report. It went to the President of the United States for his approval. Fearing that it might not receive Executive approval, because the Attorney-General thought the language of the bill was somewhat too comprehensive, a resolution was passed recalling it from the President. It was returned to the Senate by the President and referred to the Judiciary Committee. That committee then reported the bill in its present form, which, as I understand, is approved by the proper department of the Government. It eliminates the objectionable words. In its present form, with a slight amendment, it was prepared in the Department of Justice.

In brief, the facts are these: The clerks and marshals of the Territory of Utah made their reports to the Government according to the law as interpreted by the Department of Justice. In the decisions of this Department the clerks and marshals were not required to make returns of fees earned in civil cases. These accounts so submitted were settled and approved, and were, as stated, conformable to the decisions of Attorney-General Miller and Attorney-General Garland.

Since this the Solicitor of the Treasury has construed the law differently, and held that the law required them to include in the emoluments returned fees earned in civil cases. This decision is contrary to the rulings of the past and the construction of the Department; but, in accordance with this ruling, it is impossible for the Treasury officials to approve and settle certain of the accounts of the clerks and marshals of Utah. For the purpose of permitting the Department to close up these accounts the passage of this bill is desired.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KING, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

USE OF RESERVATIONS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up Senate joint resolution 145, now on the Speaker's table, authorizing the Secretary of War to grant permits to the executive committee on inaugural ceremonies for use of reservations or public spaces in the city of Washington on the occasion of the inauguration of the President-elect on March 4, 1901, etc. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin calls up Senate joint resolution 145 and asks unanimous consent for its present consideration, and the Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to grant permits to the committee on inaugural ceremonies for the use of any reservations or other public spaces in the city of Washington on the occasion of the inauguration of the President-elect, on the 4th day of March, 1901, which, in his opinion, will inflict no serious or permanent injuries upon such reservations or public spaces or statuary thereon; and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may designate, for such and other purposes on the occasion aforesaid, such streets, avenues, and sidewalks in said city of Washington as they may deem proper and necessary: Provided, however, That all stands or platforms that may be erected on the public spaces aforesaid shall be under the supervision of the said inaugural committee and in accordance with plans and designs to be approved by the Architect of the Capitol, the commissioner of public buildings and grounds, and the building inspector of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to permit the committee on illumination of the citizens' inaugural committee for the inaugural ceremonies, March, 1901, to stretch suitable overhead conductors, with sufficient supports, wherever necessary and in the nearest practicable connection with the present supply of light, for the purpose of effecting the said illumination: Provided, That the said conductors shall not be used for the conveying of electrical currents after March 6, 1901, and shall, with their supports, be fully and entirely removed from the streets and avenues of the said city of Washington on or before March 15, 1901: Provided further, That the stretching and removing of the said wires shall be under the supervision of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, who shall see that the provisions of this resolution are enforced, that all needful precautions are taken for the protection of the public, and that the pavement of any street, avenue, or alley disturbed is replaced in as good condition as before entering upon the work herein authorized: Provided further, That no expense or damage on account of or due to the stretching, operation, or removing of the said temporary overhead conductors shall be incurred by the United States or the District of Columbia: Provided further, That for the purposes of this act the construction of additional underground conduits is specifically prohibited.

SEC. 3. That $10,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, payable from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated and from the revenues of the District of Columbia in equal parts, is hereby appropriated to enable the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to maintain public order and protect life and property in said District from the 28th of February to the 9th of March, 1901, both inclusive. Said Commissioners are hereby authorized and directed to make all reasonable regulations necessary to secure such preservation of public order and protection of life and property and fixing fares by public conveyance during said period. Any person violating any of such regulations shall be liable for each such offense to a fine not to exceed $100 in the police court of said district, and in default of payment thereof to imprisonment in the workhouse of said District for not longer than sixty days.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy be, and they are hereby, authorized to loan to the committee on inaugural ceremonies such ensigns, flags, etc. (except battle flags), that are not now in use and may be suitable and proper for decoration and may be spared without detriment to the public service, such flags to be used by said committee under such regulations and restrictions as may be prescribed by the said Secretaries, or either of them, in decorating the fronts of public buildings and other places on the line of march between the Capitol and the Executive Mansion and the interior of the reception hall: Provided, That the said committee shall indemnify the said Departments, or either of them, for any loss or damage to such flags not necessarily incident to such use.

SEC. 5. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized to permit the Western Union Telegraph Company to extend overhead wires into the Pension building and to such points along the line of parade as shall be deemed by the chief marshal convenient for use in connection with the parade and other inaugural purposes, the said wires to be taken down within ten days after the conclusion of the ceremonies on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1901.

SEC. 6. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to issue to steam railroad companies in said District permits to temporarily occupy additional parts of streets for the purpose of accommodating the traveling public attending the inaugural ceremonies in March, 1901: Provided, That such temporary occupation shall not exceed the period of fifteen days, and shall be subject to conditions prescribed by said Commissioners.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] whether this resolution follows the form of those usually adopted for inaugural occasions, or whether there is anything else whatever in it?

Mr. BABCOCK. In answer to the gentleman from Tennessee, I will say that this is an exact duplicate of several resolutions adopted in January and February four years ago, with this difference: Four years ago the appropriation was $8,200; this year it is $10,000. Four years ago the resolutions permitted the Western Union Telegraph Company only to carry its lines into the Pension building; this year the Postal Telegraph is permitted entrance there as well as the Western Union. There is further provision that no temporary tracks shall be laid upon or over any of the parks of the city. With these differences, this resolution is an exact duplicate of those passed four years ago.

Mr. BELL. Is the Government of the United States to pay this entire appropriation of $10,000?

Mr. BABCOCK. No, sir; one half is to be paid by the District and the other half by the General Government.

Mr. BELL. I do not want to object to this bill, but I would like about ten minutes in which to make a few observations on it.

Mr. BABCOCK. The matter of time, I presume, will be entirely in the hands of the Speaker.

Mr. BELL. Will the gentleman object to my request?

Mr. BABCOCK. No, sir; I will not.

Mr. BELL. With the understanding that we can have a little discussion, I will not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none.

Mr. DALZELL. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield for a question?

Mr. BABCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. DALZELL. As I understand, this resolution provides for no other committees than those committees of citizens specially created in connection with the inauguration ceremonies. It has no reference to any committee of either House?

Mr. BABCOCK. Not at all. As I have stated, it is a duplicate of resolutions passed four years ago, with the exception that this resolution appropriates $1,800 more than the resolution which was then adopted.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin allow me a suggestion?

Mr. BABCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. It occurs to me that in the clause with reference to indemnities for injuries which may happen to flags or banners of which the Departments have custody and which it is proposed that they loan for this occasion, the six words "not necessarily incident to such use" should be stricken out. It seems to me that whatever injury may happen to these flags and banners would undoubtedly happen in their necessary use, and the Departments should be indemnified for all injuries that might result, for instance, from inclemency of the weather or similar causes.

Mr. BABCOCK. In answer to the gentleman from Illinois, I will say that the committee of 60 representative citizens of Washington represent simply the Government in this celebration; they will simply act for the Government. I see no point or object which would be obtained by making them specifically responsible for something that they could not replace. If an old flag—a relic in the possession of the Government—should be lost, this committee would be powerless to replace it. I repeat, that this resolution is an exact duplicate of the resolutions under which the committees have heretofore worked.

Mr. BELL addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes; I yield to the gentleman for ten minutes.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, I remember very distinctly that four years ago we made a similar appropriation and adopted similar provisions to those which it is proposed to make to-day. Four years ago—I might say also eight years ago, and probably for a quarter of a century—the people of Washington have made the inauguration of Presidents great business enterprises for the people of the District of Columbia. I do not object to that. I am glad to see the people of the District of Columbia making this a great occasion. But it seems to me that they ought to pay the expenses connected with it, outside of the necessary expenses of providing the place, etc.

I notice that among the different governors who are being inaugurated in the different States many of them are glorying in the fact that they are having simple ceremonies, that are costing the people nothing. One governor of a Western State a few years ago—a rich man—boasted that it had only cost the people $5 for his inauguration. On the occasion of the inauguration of the governor of New Hampshire the other day the papers of that State boasted that the people had gone back to the time-honored custom of a simple ceremony in connection with the induction of the highest officer of the State into his official position.

In Washington four years ago we had a grand ball in connection with the inauguration. People came here from all parts of the country. Many of them paid from $1 to $2.50 for seats in our parks in order to witness the parade, and $5 to walk through their Pension Office, called an inauguration ball; and, according to my remembrance, when the inauguration ceremonies were over the committee of citizens of the District of Columbia had a large surplus arising from the different means they had adopted to meet the expenses, and largely through the free use of Government property.

The citizens contributed $50,000. They got it all back. They had gotten a splendid fund in addition; the hotels, the business men, and everybody else had been greatly benefited, and the Government contributed a large portion of the expense that it never expected to get back. Now, I want to say that four years ago the inauguration of a President of the United States cost us probably from $150,000 to $200,000, including use of public property, cleaning up, repairs, stopping work, etc.

Mr. BABCOCK. Does the gentleman from Colorado understand what this appropriation is for?

Mr. BELL. Yes; I understand it thoroughly. I know what it is for; I can not afford to have my time taken up now. I am going to talk upon it generally, and am not going to oppose your bill in particular. But what I want to state is that after the inauguration were over four years ago even the Republican papers of this District were astounded at the way in which the Government submitted its interests to the interests of the speculators around the city of Washington. My remembrance is that it was in the Evening Star. Its representative went over to the Pension Office and said to the Commissioner of Pensions, "I want to know what it costs the Government of the United States for you to give up the Pension Office for ten days for decoration for the inaugural ball. What did it cost the Government of the United States to have the inaugural ball?" Mr. Murphy said: "I can not give you the exact figures," but over his own signature the Commissioner of Pensions said: "I can give you the statement that the salaries of the employees of the Pension Office alone, while they were thrown out of employment and in idleness to allow the committee to decorate the Pension Office, cost this Government $70,000."

You can find that by looking back in the columns of one of the papers here, I think the Star, over the signature of the Commissioner of Pensions. It cost the Government $70,000 for the salaries of these men kept in idleness while the great Pension Office was being decorated. Probably the other expenses were a quarter more for cleaning, repairs, and getting reorganized. The same thing may be repeated at this inauguration. I am in favor of giving the Executive a decent, a moderate, a becoming inauguration; but I am not in favor of giving up these parks, giving up the Pension Office, putting these employees out of the office and leaving them in idleness for nine or ten days while the Pension Office is being decorated, and then allow the citizens here to charge the people who come here to see this inauguration from a dollar to two dollars and a half each for a seat on these public parks and $5 to walk through our Pension Office, called the grand ball, and create a great surplus fund, and help the people of this District make untold dollars out of the visitors here and the Government pay the expenses—I am opposed to it.

Mr. GAINES. How much did it cost to inaugurate Thomas Jefferson?

Mr. BELL. It cost the price of a boy to hold his horse, etc.

Mr. MADDOX. He hitched his horse to a tree.

Mr. BELL. The cost was very little. I want to say that the inducting of Governor Adams, a rich man, into the gubernatorial chair of Colorado a few years ago was announced to have cost the people just $5. Every newspaper in the State and throughout the West commended that. They would commend such an act here, if they had a chance. Now, I am not in favor of cutting down any necessary expenses, but I want to say I was here in Washington at an inauguration before I was elected to Congress. I had been here for a week or two at a leading hotel.

I remember well that they made every guest in that hotel move out of his room for three days or pay double price. Four of us were put in one room, paying the same price that we had paid for a week or more before when we each had a separate room. It is made a business proposition in this city from beginning to end. I am willing that that should be, but I say if they want this royal, this regal display for the purpose of collecting people from the outside in order that it may benefit the hotels and merchants, the people of the District of Columbia, the merchants and this association ought to pay the expenses. And I warn you now that the Pension Office this year will probably be dismantled, will probably have its employees idle for ten days, as it did four years ago, and will cost this Government $70,000 for their salaries, as Mr. Murphy says it did four years ago, and other like expenses will be made, not connected with a direct appropriation.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. BABCOCK. For what purpose?

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I should like to make some remarks at this time. I am to go away to-day with a committee of the House, and I would like time now to correct some misstatements that have been made about Boston's commerce during the debate on the river and harbor bill.

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

[Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to me for a question?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes.

Mr. GAINES. The tickets to this reception or ball at the Pension Office—how are they obtained, and who has the legal right to them, if there are any legal rights about it?

Mr. BABCOCK. As I understand, Mr. Speaker, the issuing of tickets is entirely in the hands of the citizens' committee. What their regulations are or whether they have been adopted at this time I do not know.

Mr. GAINES. Have not the members of Congress any legal right at all to tickets?

Mr. BABCOCK. They have tickets to the Capitol.

Mr. GAINES. Is not this money that we are appropriating to help pay the expenses of this thing?

Mr. BABCOCK. It is simply for police protection.

Mr. GAINES. And we have no legal right at all and no admission to the floor because we are members of Congress, nor our families or friends?

Mr. BABCOCK. It is usual for each Member and Senator to have tickets to the exercises at the Capitol, but we have no exclusive right.

Mr. GAINES. I am trying to get a little information, and I am getting it, as to how the people are to get into this "magnificent ball" that is to be held.

Mr. BERRY. Anybody can get in by paying $5.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield further?

Mr. BABCOCK. I yielded for a question.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the joint resolution.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, I am not quite through.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. GAINES. The gentleman has yielded, and I was asking him a question for information.

Mr. BABCOCK. I yielded to the gentleman from Tennessee for a question.

Mr. GAINES. I have asked the gentleman a question and now I will ask another. [Cries of "Louder!"]

I want to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if he thinks it right for Congress to appropriate money for these ceremonies and members of Congress not have any legal right to the floor where those ceremonies are had? Now, that is the substance of my question. I want to get information; this is not so much for myself as some of my people, and several who are not, and have written me.

Mr. BABCOCK. What floor does the gentleman speak of?

Mr. GAINES. I want to get in on the ground floor as you do. [Laughter.] I want to get in on the ground floor on the ground, and I want to face the gentleman on that happy occasion.

Mr. BABCOCK. I do not know where the ground floor is on this occasion.

Mr. GAINES. Then I have entirely misread the history of the gentleman from Wisconsin. I had an idea that he got in on the ground floor on everything.

Mr. BABCOCK. The Government is making no appropriation whatever for any ceremonies. The appropriation, $10,000, carried in this bill is for additional police protection and the necessary expenses incident thereto for the ten days of the celebration.

Mr. GAINES. We turn it over to the District.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BABCOCK, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask that House joint resolution 287, a duplicate of the Senate joint resolution, and now on the Calendar, be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks that the House resolution of similar purport be laid on the table. Without objection, this order will be made.

There was no objection.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the change of reference of two bills, the bill S. R. 138 and the bill H. R. 13107, from the District of Columbia to the Committee on Appropriations, on the request of the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia. The Clerk will report the bills by their titles.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13107) providing for improvements in the office of the assessor of the District of Columbia.

Joint resolution (S. R. 138) providing for the paving of certain streets in the city of Washington.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, these changes will be made.

There was no objection.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of private bills under the special order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of private bills under the special order for that purpose.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 133, noes 9.

Mr. TALBERT. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Pending the count,

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws the point of order. The ayes have it, and accordingly the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. LACEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That during the remainder of this Congress the second and fourth Friday in each month, after the disposal of such business on the Speaker's table as requires reference only, shall be set apart for the consideration of private pension bills, bills for the removal of political disabilities, and bills removing charges of desertion. The provision herein made shall be in lieu of the evening session provided for by section 2 of Rule XXVI, and section 6 of Rule XXVI and section 1 of Rule XXVI are hereby modified to conform herewith.

OLIVIA DONATHY.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8106) granting a pension to Olivia Donathy.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll the name of Olivia Donathy, the helpless child of James A. Donathy, deceased, late of Company K, Fifty-ninth Illinois Infantry, and pay her a pension of $12 per month.

The amendment recommended by the Committee was read, as follows:

In line 4 strike out all after the word "place" and all of lines 5, 6, and 7 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "On the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Olivia Donathy, the helpless and dependent daughter of James A. Donathy, late of Company K, Fifty-ninth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the report read.

Mr. GIBSON. I hope the gentleman will not call for the reading of the report, but will permit a short statement to be made.

Mr. TALBERT. I will be satisfied with a statement.

Mr. GIBSON. This is a helpless child of an old soldier, and this gives her $12 a month.

Mr. TALBERT. All right. I think a statement should be made or the report read.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

HORACE L. STILES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9165) to increase the pension of Horace L. Stiles.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Horace L. Stiles, late of the Third Independent Battery of New York Light Artillery Volunteers, and pay him a pension at the rate of fifty dollars a month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendments recommended by the Committee were read, as follows:

In line 6, after the word "Battery," strike out the word "of."

In line 7 strike out the word "Volunteers;" and in the same line, after the words "New York," insert the word "Volunteer."

In line 8 strike out the word "fifty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "seventeen;" in the same line strike out the word "a" and insert in lieu thereof of the word "per."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Horace L. Stiles."

Mr. CALDERHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word in reference to the amendments recommended by the committee. The bill was reported by the committee without the consideration of some testimony filed in the case at the time. If that testimony had been under consideration at the time, the bill would have been reported at $50 a month. My colleague upon the committee [Mr. MIERS] reported the bill in my absence, and I have been giving special attention to the examination of the case. Since the time the bill was reported the soldier has become entirely helpless from paralysis, so that he requires the constant care and attention of another person, and he will during the remainder of his days.

I want to say that at the time the bill was under consideration he was then suffering a disability, which I believed from the evidence on file in the Pension Bureau to be the result of his service. Two doctors are operating upon him once every week or two weeks for dropsy, and at the time the bill was under consideration 54 ounces of water within one week were taken from him by an operation upon his chest. Now, this soldier has a remarkable record as a soldier. He had four years of excellent service; served until the close of the war; was injured in the chest in time of action, and that injury I believe to be the cause of the disability which he suffers and for which he asks pension. The Pension Bureau itself was not clearly satisfied that the disease of heart was the result of that injury, and yet I think upon a fair examination of the testimony it shows it to be the result of his service. If that testimony had been accepted the Department would have given him $50 a month without question.

I have now here the evidence showing, since the time the bill was reported, that he has been stricken with paralysis, which appears to be the result of disease of the heart, so that he requires and will require during the remainder of his days the constant care and attendance of another person. I therefore oppose the amendment of the committee, and I think I have the support of all the members of the committee who have learned of the case since the report was made. I ask that the amendment be voted down.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman from Kansas insert the evidence in the RECORD as a part of his remarks?

Mr. CALDERHEAD. I am perfectly willing.

Mr. GIBSON. I suggest to the gentleman from Kansas that he modify his request and move to amend by striking out the word "seventeen" and inserting "fifty;" so as to let the balance of the amendment, which goes to the form of the bill, prevail.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. I thank the gentleman from Tennessee, and will comply with his suggestion. The other amendments suggested by the committee are proper, and I therefore move to amend the amendment by striking out the word "seventeen" and inserting the word "fifty."

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say to the committee that at the time this bill was before the Invalid Pensions Committee important proof was not on file, and, as a consequence, the committee has inadvertently done an injustice to this man. I am of the opinion that the amendment to the amendment should prevail. This man was totally helpless. He was in the city last summer and I had a chance to see him, and I know of my own personal knowledge that the man is absolutely helpless. In fact, he was reported dead while he was here, but afterwards the report was found to be untrue, and, as I say, the committee has done the man an injustice on account of the proof not being on file when the committee had the case before it for action.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest that the better way would be to first take a vote upon all the amendments except the one referred to by the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the committee amendment striking out the word "fifty" and inserting "seventeen."

The question was taken, and the amendment was not agreed to.

The bill as amended was then laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

RICHARD MYERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11680) granting a pension to Richard Myers.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Richard Myers, son of George W. Myers, late of the Second Connecticut Light Battery, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 a month.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

Strike out all of lines 6, 7, and 8, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "of Isabela Myers, widow of George W. Myers, late of the Second Battery, Connecticut Volunteer Light Artillery, and pay her a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving: Provided, however, That in case of the death of the helpless child, Richard E. Myers, on whose account the pension of Isabela Myers is increased, the pension of said Isabela Myers shall continue only at the rate of $12 per month from and after the date of death of said helpless child."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Isabela Myers."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN R. ROBINSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10021) granting an increase of pension to John R. Robinson.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John R. Robinson, late of Company D, One hundred and Thirty-fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JOEL H. HALLOWELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1604) for the benefit of Joel H. Hallowell, of Covington, Ky.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll the name of Joel H. Hallowell, a private in Company D, Sixth Pennsylvania Cavalry Volunteers, in the war of the rebellion, now residing at Covington, Ky., at the rate of $25 per month.

The amendments recommended by the committee were as follows:

In line 4 strike out all after the word "place," and all of lines 5, 6, 7, and 8, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Joel H. Hallowell, late of Company D, Sixth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Joel H. Hallowell."

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ELAM KIRK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2954) granting an increase of pension to Elam Kirk.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name Elam Kirk, late of Company G, One hundred and twenty-second Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN COOMBS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 4105) granting an increase of pension to John Coombs.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John Coombs, late of Company H, Second Regiment Illinois Volunteer Heavy Artillery, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN R. M'COY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2110) restoring the pension of John R. McCoy.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John R. McCoy, late of Company H, Seventeenth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying the bill aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. TONGUE. Mr. Chairman, what is the vote asked upon?

The CHAIRMAN. On laying the bill aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. TONGUE. Is not a vote to be taken on the amendment recommended by the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. There is no amendment.

Mr. GIBSON. The committee simply recommends the passage of the bill as it came from the Senate.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

DAVID H. MOREY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2753) granting an increase of pension to David H. Morey.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of David H. Morey, late of Company F, Seventeenth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

HENRY VAN GELDER.

The next business was the bill (S. 2819) granting an increase of pension to Henry Van Gelder.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Henry Van Gelder, late of Company G, Sixty-fifth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

AMERICUS V. RICE.

The next business was the bill (S. 3890) granting an increase of pension to Americus V. Rice.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Americus V. Rice, late colonel Fifty-seventh Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and brigadier-general, United States Volunteers, and pay him a pension at the rate of $60 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the House to this bill and earnestly request that members give it close attention. It is my purpose to offer an amendment. I requested permission to do so from the committee, and it was readily granted. At the time this bill was before the Senate committee the full facts were not in the possession of that committee. I call for the reading of the Senate report, which I hope will receive the close attention of every member of the House; and then I propose to offer an amendment to the bill striking out $60 as the amount of the proposed pension and inserting $100.

The Clerk read as follows:

This bill as amended proposes to increase from $36 to $60 per month the pension of Americus V. Rice, of Washington, D. C., late colonel Fifty-seventh Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and brigadier-general, United States Volunteers.

General Rice, at the first call for volunteers in April, 1861, enlisted in the three months' service. He was mustered in as captain Company E, Twenty-first Ohio Volunteers, April 27, 1861, and was discharged August 12, 1861. He then began recruiting for the service, which he reentered September 2, 1861, as captain Company A, Fifty-seventh Ohio Volunteers. He was promoted lieutenant-colonel, same regiment, February 3, 1862, and was mustered in as colonel February 19, 1864, to date May 24, 1863. He was appointed brigadier-general, United States Volunteers, May 31, 1865, which appointment he accepted June 18, 1865, and was honorably mustered out of service January 15, 1866.

A complete statement of his military service, furnished by the War Department, is as follows:

RECORD AND PENSION OFFICE, WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, May 7, 1900.

SIR: In response to your request for the military and medical record of Americus V. Rice, late brigadier-general of volunteers, for use in connection with Senate bill 3890, I have the honor to inform you as follows:

It is shown by the records that Americus V. Rice was mustered into service April 27, 1861, as captain of Company E, Twenty-first Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry (three months' organization), and that he was mustered out with his company, as captain, August 12, 1861.

He was again mustered into service September 2, 1861, as captain of Company A, Fifty-seventh Ohio Volunteer Infantry, to serve three years; was promoted to lieutenant-colonel, same regiment, about February 8, 1862, and was mustered in as colonel, same regiment, February 19, 1864, to date May 24, 1863; was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers May 31, 1865, which appointment he accepted June 18, 1865, and was honorably mustered out of service as brigadier-general of volunteers, in General Orders, No. 168, War Department, Adjutant-General's Office, dated December 28, 1865, to take effect January 15, 1866.

From the date of his muster in as captain in the Fifty-seventh Ohio to May 22, 1863, when disabled at Vicksburg, Miss., he is shown to have been continuously on duty with his regiment, which formed a part of Gen. W. T. Sherman's command and participated in the western campaign, including the battle of Shiloh, the siege of Corinth, the battles of Chickasaw Bayou and Arkansas Post, and the siege of Vicksburg.

At Vicksburg he led his regiment in the assault on the enemy's works on May 22, 1863, when he was severely wounded below the knee and in the thigh of the right leg. On account of this wound he was absent thereafter until the spring of 1864, when he resumed command of his regiment. He led his regiment in an assault on the enemy's works at Kenesaw Mountain, Georgia, June 27, 1864, where he was again badly disabled, sustaining a wound of the left ankle and fractures of the shin bone and the thigh of the right leg, necessitating the amputation of the right leg above the knee. On account of this wound he was again absent until about April, 1865. Meanwhile, on December 14, 1864, by reason of physical disability from wounds received in action, a special order was issued from the War Department honorably discharging him from the service as colonel of the Fifty-seventh Ohio, but on the request of Colonel Rice and the governor of Ohio, supported by the earnest recommendation of General Sherman, this order was revoked and he was restored to his command by a special order from the Department, dated March 29, 1865, whereupon he rejoined his regiment.

Upon his promotion to brigadier-general of volunteers, he was, on June 17, 1865, assigned to the command of the Third Brigade, Second Division, Fifteenth Corps, on which duty he continued until August 19, 1865, after which date, his services being no longer required, he was at his home in Ohio on waiting orders to the date of his discharge.

This officer is informally mentioned in the reports of his superiors for skill and gallantry in the different actions in which he took part, and he was several times recommended for promotion to brigadier-general. In repeating the recommendation under date of May 28, 1865, General Sherman said:

"I have heretofore recommended for promotion to brigadier-general of volunteers Col. A. V. Rice, Fifty-seventh Ohio Infantry, for special gallantry at Vicksburg and Kenesaw, at which latter place he was wounded terribly.

"I again renew my recommendation and state that Colonel Rice is one of those young officers who have served with me all through the time since Shiloh and enabled me to do the service I did. I know his capacity and fitness, and know that the promotion is more than deserved. It is fairly due to put him on a par with his fellows who have already been properly promoted."

Very respectfully,
F. C. AINSWORTH,
Chief Record and Pension Office.

The CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON PENSIONS,
United States Senate.

General Rice was severely wounded below the knee and in the thigh of the right leg in the assault on the enemy's works at Vicksburg, Miss., May 22, 1863, and still carries in his body the bullet with which he was then wounded. At Kenesaw Mountain, Georgia, June 27, 1864, he was badly disabled, sustaining a wound of the left ankle and fractures of the shin bone and thigh of the right leg, necessitating the amputation of the right leg above the knee. The leg was taken off in the field hospital, and many pieces of bone came out of the left foot. He was supplied with an artificial leg, and after a time returned to the front and joined General Sherman in his march to the sea, serving with the wooden leg until his discharge in January, 1866, having served nearly five years.

General Rice was pensioned for the loss of his right leg, and is now receiving $36 per month. For a time after the war he was able to wear an artificial leg, but the loss of the right leg brought an additional burden on the left foot, which was wounded and crippled, and caused great pain and suffering in addition to that caused by the condition of the stump and the pressure of the artificial leg. The condition of the leg and foot grew worse, and the suffering increased from these injuries, and also the wound made by the encysted bullet, until it became unendurable.

In December, 1893, he was operated on in Chicago, and the sciatic nerve was found to be in such condition that it was necessary to lay it bare for about a foot, and to dissect and cut off several inches of it. During this operation the bullet in his thigh was located, but it was found near an artery, and the surgeons considered its removal dangerous. Since 1893 he has been unable to use an artificial limb of any kind, and has been obliged to use two crutches. Extra work is thus put upon the left foot, which is weak and continually painful, especially in the latter part of the day.

Many nights the suffering from this foot and the leg is such that he is unable to sleep, and often he requires treatment and attendance three or four nights each week. He has been obliged to spend frequently, since 1866, large sums of money for physicians, surgeons, nurses, and attendants in doctoring and caring for the disabilities received in the service.

General Rice is unable to receive an increase of pension under the general law, and there is no relief for him except by special act of Congress. Though several times wounded, he has been pensioned only for the one which necessitated the amputation of the leg, the general pension laws not allowing the compounding of rates. For the wounds of foot and thigh the bullet remaining therein, he would undoubtedly be entitled to a pension of $30 per month (total of his rank as colonel), and because of his inability to wear an artificial limb, owing to the condition of the stump, he is in all fairness and equity entitled to $45 per month. The circumstances of his case are exceptional and peculiar and merit recognition by Congress.

General Rice's military services were distinguished and honorable, and he was no less distinguished in civil life. He was a member of the House of Representatives in the Forty-fourth and Forty-fifth Congresses, and was chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions. He was a brave and gallant soldier, and your committee are of the opinion that his pension should be increased.

The bill is therefore reported back favorably with a recommendation that it pass.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. I now offer the amendment I have already indicated—to strike out "$60" and insert "$100."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. STEELE. Let us hear the reasons why this should be done.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The reasons have been very fully stated in the report just read.

Mr. STEELE. I will not ask that it be read again.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I believe that an explanation is due to this House. I desire to say that no soldier of the civil war—I care not from whence he came—ever made a better record than did General Rice. Entering the service in 1861 at the first call for the three months' service, he remained in service until the close of the war and beyond—till 1866. Five consecutive times he was shot and severely wounded. After losing a leg at Kennesaw, he came home, obtained a wooden leg, and returned to the service. But the loss of that leg, with the accompanying shock, was not the only or principal injury. At Vicksburg he was again severely wounded, the ball never having been extracted. The foot of his remaining leg was crushed, and from it some 30 or 40 pieces of bone have been extracted.

We have now the additional evidence that he was not able to procure—when this matter was before the Senate committee—the affidavit of the surgeon who treated him and of the surgeon who made the amputation in Chicago.

General Rice was a man of means; he was comfortably situated and took no thought of the morrow. While earning a comfortable living, he asked nothing from the Government, although he had given it almost his life. But later, adversity overtook him, for which he was in no way responsible, and to-day he is dependent, with a family upon his hands. In absolute justice he deserves this pension of $100 per month. My colleague from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], who knows General Rice intimately, will confirm every word that I utter in honor and praise of General Rice's services. I hope there will be no objection to my amendment. If it is desired that the affidavits which I have mentioned be read, I will send them to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. SIMS. Were not those affidavits before the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the House?

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. No; they were not received in time; and on my request to be permitted to make this statement, they came into my hands.

Mr. SIMS. Why was not the committee allowed to have the benefit of that evidence?

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Simply because it could not be secured in time for the committee's action; the parties could not be found.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I know General Rice, and have known him ever since the war. At that time he was a young, bright, capable, and accomplished man, full of patriotism and ambition. He received wounds more than equivalent, so far as suffering was concerned, to the loss of both his legs. One leg was shot off entirely. After the loss of that leg, in the early days of the war, the characteristics of the man were shown in the fact that after obtaining a wooden leg he returned to the service and was one of those who rode with Sherman to the sea.

He is a man of modest characteristics—never complains; but I happen to know from the very best of evidence—far better than anybody else can give—I speak of the witness who has given me her statement on this subject—that the suffering which has been endured by General Rice has been something beyond human description. And it is all the time—causing scores of sleepless nights and agonizing days. I think that if it was ever just that the Government should pay this sort of a pension, Americus V. Rice ought to receive it. I do not know what his financial condition is, but I know that he has sought and obtained some small matters of public employment, in which he has been faithful, upright, and honorable. He was twice elected to the House of Representatives as a Democratic member from Ohio, and I take great pleasure in testifying to his high character, and especially to the great sacrifice that he has made on behalf of his country.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I share in the general belief of this House that there are but few cases where pensions should be increased to a large extent, but it seems to me that this is one of the cases where there should be a generous pension granted to the soldier. I rise now more particularly to call the attention of the House to some precedents for the action here, and that would warrant the House in passing this amendment. The widow of General Grant receives a pension of $5,000 a year, the widow of General Hancock a pension of $2,000 a year, the widow of General Logan a pension of $2,000, the widow of General Blair $2,000, the widow of Rear-Admiral Nicholson $1,200, the widow of General Crook $2,000, the widow of Gen. John C. Fremont $2,000, showing ample precedent for the action of this House for granting, in this apparently meritorious case, the relief that is proposed by this amendment.

Mr. SIMS. I do not rise to controvert one word that has been said by either of the distinguished gentlemen as to the merits of this case, but I want to call attention to the course that is being pursued, which I think is worthy of some consideration. I have done so in other cases. I think that when we have a Committee on Pensions as liberal as the present Committee on Invalid Pensions, all evidence bearing on the merits of a case ought to be submitted to the committee, and let them, as they will, take into consideration the facts and circumstances connected with it and give it the weight that is due it. Now, I have seen cases of the same sort before come in that I thought less meritorious. It is natural to suppose that the friend who introduces a bill puts it up to the full amount that he thinks the party is entitled to, and usually a great deal more. Evidence is submitted to the committee and an argument is made in favor of a liberal pension.

But some evidence is withheld or not presented before the committee, and afterwards the member comes into the House and submits the further evidence, with a speech in the nature of an appeal, and then we go above the figure limited by the committee. It rather encourages this way of amending these bills and increasing the amount above that allowed by the committee. It seems to me bills of this character ought to be recommitted to the committee, to let them hear this additional evidence upon which the increase is asked. To that extent I protest against this manner of amending these bills and getting, upon evidence brought in since, an amount over and above what the very generous and liberal committee have allowed, which amount was supported by the evidence before them. Now, if the evidence did not exist when the committee considered the bill, then it would be very proper for us to consider it here; but if the evidence was within the knowledge of the member, or within the knowledge of the party seeking the increase, I think it ought to have been submitted to the committee and considered by them.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, the criticism of the gentleman from Tennessee may be right, or it may be wrong. I do not know very much about it, but I am sure the House has not often heard me make appeals for special pensions in special cases. I am sure that here is the strongest case upon its own merits, and wholly independent of the rank of the gentleman who is the claimant, that I have ever heard presented in the House of Representatives, and I have been here a long time. I do not believe that any man who would acquire, by personal contact with General Rice, one-half the knowledge of his case that I have, would hesitate to give him this pension. Now, he could not, if he should come before the committee himself, communicate all that is true of a case like that. Considering his capacity in the discharge of his duty, considering the fact that he has suffered the loss of all that was worth anything, from a physical point of view, in life, and that he carries constantly the burden of suffering that he does, it seems to me this case ought to be acted upon promptly, so that it can go back to the Senate and be acted upon there.

Mr. SIMS. I want to ask a question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. I want to ask why you did not go before the committee and give the committee the benefit of the evidence which has been presented here in the House?

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. I will answer that question. General A. V. Rice never sought an increase of his pension as long as he had a dollar on earth to expend in his own maintenance. He was compelled to go to Chicago and have this stump reamputated. He only got $30 a month, because the stump measured a fraction longer than the length required to give him $50. He went to Chicago and the reamputation was performed. Afterwards he sought to get the certificate of the surgeon who made the amputation, and got his affidavit. He got the affidavit of the assistant surgeon and of the whole office. These papers were intended to be presented to the Senate committee, but were mislaid and could not be found, and so the Senate committee did not get the benefit of them. Afterwards they were discovered in Ottawa, Ohio, his former home, and forwarded to me, but I did not receive them in time to present them to the committee when the bill was considered by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the papers referred to by the gentleman be printed as a part of his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The papers referred to are as follows;

A PETITION.

SALT LAKE CITY, December 28, 1900.

To the honorable Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: Your petitioners—merchants, bankers, and business men of Salt Lake City, Utah—respectfully represent that in compliance with "An act to provide for the purchase of a site and for the erection of a public building thereon at Salt Lake City, the capital of the State of Utah," approved March 2, 1899, advertisements were inserted in the Salt Lake Tribune for such site, requiring, among other things, that the Government building be located on "a corner lot, approximating 180 feet front by 180 feet in dimensions, is preferred. If not a corner lot, the property must approximate 180 feet by 220 feet in dimensions, the 220 feet to be street frontage." The act referred to requires, among other things, after the said advertisement is made, "that thereafter the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause examination to be made of the said bids and the said proposed sites, and shall cause statements, maps, and plats thereof to be taken and submitted to him."

Your petitioners therefore allege:

First. That no examination, such as is required by the act referred to, has ever been made.

Second. That they are informed and believe that the site was selected by one H. A. Taylor, who had visited Salt Lake City but three times and at dates long prior to 1899, and hence was not qualified at the date said site was selected to make a proper or suitable selection without personal examination.

Third. That it is south of all the business portion of the city and not in the direction of the city's growth.

Fourth. That it is on low ground, only 1½ blocks above the line of the gravity sewer. It is on ground similar to that on which the city and county building is located, the foundation of which is estimated to have cost from $40,000 to $50,000 more than if located on solid ground in the center or upper portion of the city.

Fifth. The advertisement fixed the size of the site 180 feet square if located at a street intersection. Streets in the business portion of Salt Lake City are 132 feet wide. The site selected is located on the corner of East Temple and Market streets. Market street is a private street, one block in length, half the width of the regular streets, hence it does not comply with the terms or intention of said advertisement.

Sixth. Your petitioners believe that the capital of the State of Utah should receive more consideration in the selection of a site for a public building.

That no proper consideration was given to the other numerous sites offered.

That if proper examination had been made the site which was situate on lowest ground and which would require the greatest expenditure for foundation would not have been selected.

Seventh. Your petitioners request that a committee be appointed to make a proper examination and select a site in the business district of the city, where it will be centrally located as regards population, in the direction of the city's growth, and where it will be convenient to all residents, and at the same time present an imposing and dignified appearance. They also request that all persons may be awarded an impartial hearing to present the merits of their respective locations.

And your petitioners will ever pray.

Lewis S. Mills, president Deseret National Bank; Heber J. Grant, president State Bank of Utah; John E. Dooly, banker; The Brigham Young Trust Company, by N. W. Clayton, chairman executive committee; Cooperative Wagon and Machine Company, Geo. T. Odell, general manager; Spencer Clawson & Co., wholesale dry goods; McCormick & Co., bankers; Henry Dinwoody, Dinwoody Furniture Company; Wm. R. Wallace, property owner; Hooper Building, by Jos. E. Caine, agent; Continental Market Company, J. E. Caine, president; W. F. Armstrong, president of Utah Commercial and Savings Bank; Thomas W. Jennings; Mary H. Jennings, by Thos. W. Jennings; P. W. Madsen; Utah Stove and Hardware Company, P. W. Madsen, president; Western Loan and Savings Company; J. B. Toronto, vice-president Western Loan and Savings Co.; Thomas G. Webber, merchant; Home Fire Insurance Company of Utah, by Heber J. Grant, president; Salt Lake Theater Company; Consolidated Implement Company, by Geo. A. Snow, president and general manager; The Deseret News, H. G. Whitney, business manager.

RESOLUTIONS ON THE ABOVE PETITION.

Whereas merchants, bankers, and business men of Salt Lake City have filed with the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds a petition in protest against the proposed site for the Federal building to be erected in that municipality in conformity with an act entitled "An act to provide for the purchase of a site and for the erection of a public building thereon at Salt Lake City, the capital of the State of Utah," approved March 2, 1899; and

Whereas these merchants, bankers, and business men assert that the proposed site is the most undesirable one offered and guarantee to furnish the United States Government, free of charge, any site to be selected in the most desirable business section of the city; and

Whereas these merchants, bankers, and business men contend that the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, having this matter in charge, made the selection of the proposed site in violation of the provisions of the bill approved March 2, 1899, and without having the customary examination made in the usual manner, and without giving the merits of the other offered sites due hearing and consideration; and

Whereas these merchants, bankers, and business men in their petition practically charge the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, having the matter in charge, with dereliction of duty in the selection of a proposed site in Salt Lake City: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed, authorized, and instructed to investigate the methods followed and the procedure adopted by this Assistant Secretary of the Treasury in the selection of this proposed site, to investigate fully, by hearings and otherwise, into the merits of the different sites available at Salt Lake City, and to report back to this House the one found to be most desirable and most feasible;

And be it further resolved, That the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, having this matter in charge, be directed to furnish the House of Representatives with all the papers, maps, communications, and documents relating to the selection of a site for the Federal building to be erected at Salt Lake City.

MARY BLACK.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 5853) granting a pension to Mary Black, widow of Samuel C. Black.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll, subject otherwise to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary Black, widow of Samuel C. Black, late soldier in Creek Indian war, 1836 and 1837, and that he pay her a pension of $8 per month.

The following amendments, recommended by the Committee on Pensions, were read:

The following amendments, recommended by the Committee on Pensions, were read:

Change the title so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Jane A. E. Womack."

In line 6 insert the initials "A. E." in claimant's Christian name, after the word "Jane," and in same line strike out "of Richmond, Virginia, a" and substitute therefor "totally blind and helpless."

In line 7 strike out "Herbert" and insert "Hubbard," and in same line strike out "a soldier of the" and insert "late of the Sixty-second Regiment of Virginia Volunteers."

In line 8, after the word "pension," insert "at the rate."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

MARTHA G. D. LYSTER.

The next business was the bill (S. 292) granting an increase of pension to Martha G. D. Lyster.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Martha G. D. Lyster, widow of the late W. G. Lyster, colonel Ninth Regiment United States Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JAMES A. THOMAS.

The next business was the bill (S. 2432) granting an increase of pension to James A. Thomas.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of James A. Thomas, late of Company B, Palmetto Regiment South Carolina Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $45 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The following amendment, recommended by the Committee on Pensions, was read:

In line 8, after the words "rate of," strike out "forty-five" and insert in lieu thereof "thirty-five."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

AGNES RYDER.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 7757) for the relief of Agnes Ryder, minor child of the late Thomas P. Ryder, brigade quartermaster's clerk of the Third Brigade, Third Division, First Army Corps, Spanish-American war.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Agnes Ryder, of Wilkesbarre, Pa., minor child of the late Thomas P. Ryder, brigade quartermaster's clerk of the Third Brigade, Third Division, First Army Corps, Spanish-American war, and pay her a pension at the rate of $16 per month.

The following amendments, recommended by the Committee on Pensions, were read:

In line 4, after the word "roll," insert "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

In line 5 strike out "of Wilkesbarre, Pa."

In lines 7 and 8 strike out "Spanish-American war" and substitute therefor "war with Spain."

In line 8 strike out the word "sixteen" and substitute therefor the word "twelve."

Add to the bill, after the word "month," in line 9, the words "until she shall have reached the age of 16 years."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Agnes Ryder."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ELLEN HARDIN WALWORTH.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 3545) granting a pension to Mrs. Ellen Hardin Walworth.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Ellen Hardin Walworth, dependent mother of Reubena H. Walworth, deceased, a volunteer nurse in the war with Spain, and pay her a pension at the rate of $30 a month.

The following amendments, recommended by the Committee on Pensions, were read:

In lines 4 and 5, after the words "place on the pension roll," insert the following words: "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

In line 8, after the words "at the rate of," strike out the word "thirty" and insert the word "twenty-five."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Ellen Hardin Walworth."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN M'DONALD.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 6323) for the relief of John McDonald, alias John Shannon.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of John McDonald, alias John Shannon now of Plum City, Wis., late a member of Company B, Ninetieth Regiment of Illinois Infantry, and grant him an honorable discharge from the 20th day of August, 1865.

The following amendment, recommended by the Committee on Military Affairs, was read:

Add to the bill the words:

"Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act."

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the report in that case be read.

The report (by Mr. ESCH) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6323) for the relief of John McDonald, alias John Shannon, report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass with an amendment.

It is shown by the records of the War Department that John Shannon was enrolled August 16 and mustered into service August 22, 1862, as a private in Company B, Ninetieth Illinois Infantry Volunteers, to serve three years. He was present with his company until November 25, 1863, when he was wounded in action. The medical records report him as follows:

"Received a severe gunshot wound in the groin at the battle of Missionary Ridge, November 25, 1863, and was transferred December 21, 1863. He was admitted to a general field hospital, Army of the Cumberland, Bridgeport, Ala., December 23, 1863, with gunshot wound of the left hip, and was transferred December 25, 1863."

On certificates of the proper medical authorities he was excused from reporting to his regiment for duty, owing to his feeble condition resulting from his wound, until March, 1864, when he returned to his regiment and served therewith until he was again severely wounded at the battle near Atlanta July 28, 1864. He was admitted to a general field hospital, Fifteenth Army Corps, Marietta, Ga., and was furloughed August 14, 1864, to September 12, 1864. He never thereafter returned either to the hospital or to his command, or reported his whereabouts, and in consequence was reported as having deserted September 13, 1864, his regiment having remained in the service until June 6, 1865.

In support of an application to remove the charge of desertion affidavits were filed setting forth the feeble and unfit condition of claimant from and after August, 1864, as follows:

Morris Mulhorn testified:

"I first saw John McDonald about the 1st of June, 1865, at Eau Galle, Dunn County, Wis.; he was doing chores for Mr. Carson, of said place; know that he was wounded; saw his wound several times; known him ever since."

The claimant, August 24, 1889, testified:

"After I left the hospital I reported to First Lieut. Thomas Grady every twenty days. I believe four times Dr. Fowler gave me the extension for furlough. My mother took care of me during that time. After my mother's death I moved to Eau Galle, Wis., and was cared for by Mrs. Maria Rayburn, of said place. Dr. Crocker attended me, knowing that I could not do any duty nor even could help myself. I afterwards failed to call for any further extensions for furloughs."

W. S. Smith, of Eau Galla, Wis., testified—

"That he has been well acquainted with John McDonald, alias John Shannon, since June, 1864, up to the present time, and that from said acquaintance he knows of his own knowledge that from November, 1864, to June, 1865, claimant was suffering from gunshot wounds received while he was in said United States service, and to such an extent as to render him entirely unfit to travel away from his residence; and further say that since said last-mentioned period said claimant has been unable to do more than one-quarter of the labor of a sound man on account of effects of said disability."

George Delong, of Eau Galla, Wis., testified—

"That claimant was suffering from a gunshot wound in left hip to such an extent as to entirely incapacitate and unfit him to travel the least distance from home."

Wallace J. Smith, of Rock Elm, Wis., testified—

"That claimant's wound was so bad that he could not move himself only as he was assisted by others to move him, and this entire helplessness continued during all the time as above stated; saw the wound; claimant had not been home more than ten or twenty days before said wound broke out and became a running sore, discharging pus and a number of small pieces of bone."

From the above evidence the committee is of the opinion that claimant was wholly incapacitated for further military service after receiving his second wound, and that he used reasonable diligence in trying to secure extensions of his furlough until the time when actual hostilities ceased. That claimant had no intention of deserting, but his entire record shows him to have been a brave and faithful soldier.

Therefore the committee recommends that the bill do pass with the following amendment:

"Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act."

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I do not think these cases for the removal of the charges of desertion ought to be considered here in preference to other bills, but as that is an extraordinary case I have no objection to it.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

SILAS NICHOLSON.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 7243) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Silas Nicholson.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to cause the records of the War Department to be so amended as to remove from the military record of Silas Nicholson, late a private in Company F, Fifty-fourth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, the charge of desertion, and to grant the said Silas Nicholson an honorable discharge.

The amendment set forth in the report and recommended by the Committee on Military Affairs was read.

Mr. TALBERT. I ask for the reading of the report in that case.

The report (by Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7243) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Silas Nicholson, report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass with the following amendment: "Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act."

It is shown by the records of the War Department that Sylas Nicholson, also borne on the rolls as Silas Nicholson, was enrolled March 3, 1862, as a private in Company H, Eighty-fifth Pennsylvania Infantry Volunteers, to serve three years. He was transferred to Company H, Fifty-fourth Pennsylvania Infantry Volunteers, in July or August, 1862. He reenlisted as a veteran volunteer March 12, 1864, and is reported on the company muster roll, dated June 30, 1864, absent, sick in hospital, at Newmarket, Va.

On the roll dated December 31, 1864, he is reported absent sick, and on the roll dated February 28, 1865, his name is not borne. The roll of Company F, to which he was transferred by consolidation, dated April 30, 1865, shows him absent sick, and his name is dropped from subsequent rolls, including the company muster-out roll, dated July 15, 1865. Nothing has been found on the medical records to show that he received any treatment, nor has anything been found of record to show that he was captured by the enemy on June 18, 1864.

The War Department report further shows that in an application for removal of the charge of desertion Nicholson testified, April 30, 1890, that early in 1862 he enlisted as a private in Company H, Eighty-fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Infantry Volunteers, when he was a boy 17 years old; that he reenlisted as a veteran volunteer in the spring of 1864, upon promise of a furlough and a bounty of $300, neither of which he ever received. Before reenlisting he was with McClellan's army "and took part in the battles of Yorktown, Williamsburg, Fair Oaks, and the balance of those fights to Harrisons Landing." After reenlisting in 1864 "we went with Seigel up the valley, and when Hunter superseded him we went with him. At New Market I was taken with erysipelas in both legs, and was sent to hospital in an old church at New Market. Hunter moved down the valley, and he was hardly out of sight when the rebels came in and captured the hospital and took us to Mount Jackson. We stayed there about a week, and were then moved to Luray. Here we were kept a week or ten days, and one afternoon they gave us three days' rations and said we would start for Richmond in the morning. During the night two of us pulled out and took to the North Mountain, and in the course of two weeks reached our lines on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad at Cherry Run. I had the erysipelas in my legs so badly that we went very slowly. From there I went to my home in Pennsylvania. This was some time late in the fall of 1864."

He stayed at home about a month and got medicine from a doctor in Centerville, Pa., but does not know his name. Instead of returning to his regiment, he went to an uncle of his in Ohio, but was unable to do any work until about May, 1865, when he went to work on a farm, and in the fall of 1865 he married. That from the time he escaped from the rebels until Lee's surrender he was, on account of the disease in his legs, unfit for military duty. He regrets the mistake he made in not reporting to his regiment. He has 12 children, and on this account, he says, he desires his military record corrected.

The above affidavit was, on the 30th day of September, 1899, supplemented by another affidavit of the soldier and filed in the War Department. The facts set forth in this latter affidavit are similar to those set out in the former, with the additional declarations that he was not cured of his disease until long after the war was ended; that he was never a deserter, and is entitled to his discharge for faithful services he rendered his country until he was taken sick and captured.

W. H. Sanner, of Somerset County, Pa., in an affidavit filed in the War Department, testified, September 14, 1899, that in 1862 he was on recruiting service and enlisted Silas Nicholson. He met him frequently while in the service, and knows him to be the identical person he represents himself to be; that at the battle of New Market, Va., the 15th of May, 1864, Nicholson was reported among the casualties by his officers as "missing."

The affidavits of Fredrick Krebs, Francis May, Peter Nicholson, and Jacob Nicholson, all on file in the War Department, corroborate the statement of the soldier, that he returned to his home in Pennsylvania with erysipelas in his legs in the fall of 1864, and on account of the disease was unfit for labor until after the war was ended.

From the time of his enlistment in the spring of 1862 to his return home in the fall of 1864 this soldier did faithful service to his country, and your committee, in consideration thereof, his youth, and the circumstances under which he was separated from the Army, recommend the passage of the bill with the amendment aforesaid.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, it appears from the reading of this report that this man enlisted several different times in several different commands. It is easy to assume that he must have received a bounty every time he enlisted; and it does seem to me from the reading of the report that there is very little merit in the case. I therefore move that this bill be laid aside with an unfavorable report.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who introduced the bill is not present, and I suggest to the gentleman if it would not be fair to him to allow it to be passed over for the present without prejudice.

Mr. TALBERT. I have no objection to that.

Subsequently,

Mr. ROBB. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask that we go back to the bill H. R. 7243, which was passed over without prejudice. I ask that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question will first be upon the amendment. The Clerk will report the bill by its title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7243) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Silas Nicholson.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

MRS. ADDIE L. POTTER.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 7053) for the relief of Mrs. Addie L. Potter.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Addie L. Potter, widow of the late John Wesley Potter, late of Company B, Twenty-ninth New Jersey Volunteers, at the rate of $8 a month.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

BENJAMIN E. STYLES.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 8091) granting a pension to Benjamin E. Styles.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Benjamin E. Styles, late first sergeant Company I, Fiftieth Regiment Ohio Infantry Volunteers, on the pension roll at the rate of $12 per month.

The following amendment, recommended by the committee, was read:

In line 4 strike all after the word "place" and all of lines 5, 6, and 7 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Benjamin E. Styles, late of Company I, Fiftieth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ELLEN H. PHILLIPS.

The next business was the bill (H. H. 8794) to place on the pension roll the name of Ellen H. Phillips.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Ellen H. Phillips, widow of the late Capt. Morton L. Phillips, and pay her a pension at the rate of $50 a month.

The following amendments, recommended by the committee, were read:

In line 6 strike out the words "the late captain."

In line 7, after the word "Phillips," insert the words "late captain, United States Revenue-Cutter Service;" in the same line strike out the word "fifty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty;" in the same line strike out the word "a" and insert in lieu thereof the word "per."

In line 8, after the word "month," insert the following: "in lieu of that she is now receiving."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ELIZABETH DICKERSON.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 11927) granting a pension to Elizabeth Dickerson, formerly widow of James Bohler.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth Dickerson, formerly widow of James Bohler, late of Company L, Second Regiment Iowa Cavalry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 a month.

The following amendments, recommended by the committee, were read:

In line 6, after the word "formerly," insert the word "the;" in the same line strike out the word "Bohler" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Boller."

In line 7, before the word "Cavalry," insert the word "Volunteer."

In line 8, before the word "month," strike out the word "a" and insert in lieu thereof the word "per."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN ABEL.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 3436) for the relief of John Abel.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of John Abel, late of Company K, Eighteenth Missouri Infantry Volunteers, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The following amendment, recommended by the committee, was read:

In line 4 strike out all after the word "roll" and all of lines 5, 6, 7, and 8 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John Abel, late of Company K, Eighteenth Regiment Missouri Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JEROME W. ROWLEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11583) granting an increase of pension to Jerome R. Rowley.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jerome R. Rowley, late of Company F, Sixty-fifth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the bill by striking out "fifty," in line 8, and inserting "seventy;" and in connection with that motion I ask for the reading of the report.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

In line 8 strike out "fifty" and insert "seventy."

The report by Mr. GASTON was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 11583) granting an increase of pension to Jerome W. Rowley, submit the following report:

This beneficiary, now 57 years of age, served as a corporal in Company F, Sixty-fifth Ohio Volunteers, from November 22, 1861, to June 6, 1864, when he was discharged on surgeon's certificate of disability, by reason of a gunshot wound of right arm, received in battle at Chickamauga, September 19, 1863, making amputation necessary 3 inches below the shoulder; and the files of the Pension Bureau show that he was pensioned at $8 per month from discharge; $15 from June 6, 1866; at $18 from August 5, 1872; at $24 from June 4, 1874; at $30 from March 3, 1883, and at $45 from August 4, 1886.

Claims for increase of pension, filed May 2, 1895, and August 30, 1897, in which rheumatism and blood poisoning were alleged as results of the amputation, were rejected September 7, 1895, and December 14, 1898, respectively, upon the ground that the beneficiary was receiving the specific rating allowed by law for the amputation of an arm so near the shoulder joint as to prevent the use of an artificial arm; that blood poisoning was not shown, and that the rheumatism could not be accepted as a result of the wound.

Medical and other testimony filed by the beneficiary in his claim for increase of pension shows that the beneficiary has almost completely lost the power of motion; that he is unable to get up or sit down, stand or walk, get into bed or out of it by himself, and that he requires aid and attendance all the time; that this condition is due to arthritis rheumatica deformans.

The last certificate of examination, made November 19, 1898, describes his condition as follows:

"General emaciation of the whole body; loss of right arm in close proximity to shoulder joint; tenderness along the entire course of the spinal column; anchylosis of hips, knee, and ankle joints; motion in such joints entirely lost; knee joints enlarged and tendons contracted; anchylosis of left shoulder, elbow, and wrist joints; forearm flexed at angle of 45°; contraction of tendons of fingers and thumb of left hand, with usefulness of this hand and arm entirely lost. He requires the constant aid and attendance of another person, and on retiring or rising the assistance of two or more persons; and the surgeon who examined him stated that in his opinion the condition of the applicant was due to blood poisoning and gangrene from the wound."

While it is not shown as a fact that the rheumatism which causes the helplessness of this soldier is due to his military service, your committee, in view of the fact that the soldier lost an arm in the service, for which he is receiving the rate provided by law, namely, $45 per month, and that he is now in a helpless condition and requires the aid and attendance of another person, and that the rheumatism may probably be of service origin, believes that the increase sought for in the bill—an increase of $5 per month—is warranted under the circumstances, and reports the bill back with the recommendation that it pass.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, the reading of this report shows that this soldier is perfectly and absolutely helpless. That he was a gallant soldier is evidenced by the fact that he lost his arm in battle. He served his country for nearly three years. There is a dispute between the medical authorities as to whether or not his present helpless condition is due entirely to the gunshot wound or not; at all events, it appears he is entirely helpless. His right arm was amputated so close to the shoulder that an artificial arm could not be used. His left shoulder, elbow, wrist, and even his fingers are wholly paralyzed, and he can not walk, stand, or sit without aid or assistance of another person putting him in position. Every joint of his body is helpless, and he needs the care and attention to-day of at least one, and frequently of two, persons to assist him.

Mr. GAINES. How much does your bill provide?

Mr. WEAVER. The bill calls for $50 a month. He is drawing $45 now. The bill calls for $50, the amount that was fixed in the bill as introduced; and in connection with that I desire to state, Mr. Chairman, that through a mistake in drawing the bill fifty was written instead of seventy.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me a suggestion?

Mr. WEAVER. Certainly.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I desire to say that the committee realized the difficulty and thought the man was entitled to more than $50 at the time, but as the bill only called for $50 the committee accepted the amount in the bill.

Mr. WEAVER. That is true.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I think the gentleman's motion ought to prevail. The gentleman does not overstate the facts.

Mr. GAINES. Is there any difference now in the judgment of the physicians as to this man's present condition?

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, I will answer the gentleman from Tennessee that the pension office refused to increase the pension because the medical authorities there were not satisfied that this present condition was owing to the gunshot wound. The rating that he is receiving now is in accordance with the provision for amputation of the arm. But the examining surgeons examining him at the time he made the application for the increase have reported, as was read by the Clerk in the report, that they believed that the condition arose from a gunshot wound.

Mr. GAINES. Who was the examining physician?

Mr. WEAVER. A local board of examining surgeons.

Mr. GAINES. Where?

Mr. WEAVER. At Springfield, Ohio. I am personally acquainted with the case, and I know the man well. I know absolutely of his perfectly helpless condition and his dire distress and poverty.

Mr. TALBERT. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WEAVER. I will yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. TALBERT. I have no doubt the statements of the gentleman from Ohio are correct and true; but I would like to ask him if these facts were stated to the Pension Department; and if so, why couldn't they make the increase?

Mr. WEAVER. Because the medical officers of the Pension

Bureau could not trace the connection between the rheumatism and stiffening of these joints to the result of the gunshot wound.

Mr. TALBERT. It was not traceable to service origin?

Mr. WEAVER. They could not trace it to service origin.

Mr. TALBERT. In view of the fact that the Pension Department refused it, you come here as a court of appeal to get justice?

Mr. WEAVER. The gentleman from South Carolina could not have heard what I said at the opening. The local board of examining surgeons, to whom was referred the claim, thought it was due to the gunshot wound, but when it came to the board of review in the Pension Office they did not approve the report. The committee find that it is probably due to service origin. I am willing to give the claimant the benefit of the doubt to the extent which the amendment provides.

Mr. TALBERT. Now, if the gentleman from Ohio will allow me, I want to submit a remark or two.

Mr. WEAVER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, it is a fact that this House is willing to take the report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions. It seems like they have been going along voting for these bills without having the reports read, or anything of the kind. Here is a bill that the committee brings in and recommends $50 a month. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WEAVER] rises on the floor and moves to amend by making it $70; and a member of the committee gets up and says, "We thought he ought to have more, but we did not give it to him. I think the motion ought to prevail." It seems to me that puts the committee in rather a strange predicament here. We are going along, or being led along, supporting these measures because the committee has recommended them. Well, now, if that is the case, they may be above and they may be below the high-water mark. A member of the committee gets up and says he thought the claimant ought to have more, but they brought in a bill for $50 a month. If the committee thought he ought to have $70 a month, it seems to me they ought to have so reported. We are left in the dark without the help of the committee, and that is the way they propose to deal with these questions.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. If the gentleman from South Carolina will allow me, "to err is human, to forgive divine." [Laughter.]

Mr. TALBERT. Oh, I have forgiven them long ago. [Laughter.]

Mr. GIBSON. Let me say to the gentleman from South Carolina that the committee did not feel justified in allowing more than the bill called for. If the bill had called for $70 a month the committee would have allowed, probably, the $70; but the rule of the committee is not to exceed what the bill calls for. It appears in this case that the draftsman made a mistake. This is manifestly a $72 case.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WEAVER].

The question was taken; and on a division (called for by Mr. TALBERT) there were—52 ayes and 2 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

HESTER A. PHILLIPS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 4128) granting a pension to Hester A. Phillips.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Hester A. Phillips, widow of Benjamin B. Phillips, late of Company K, Sixth Regiment Delaware Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $8 per month.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

EDWIN S. ANDERSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 993) granting an increase of pension to Edwin S. Anderson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Edwin S. Anderson, late of Company A, Eighty seventh Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $15 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

WILLIAM R. M'MASTER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 3223) granting an increase of pension to William R. McMaster.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William R. McMaster, late of Company F, Eighth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, and Company I, Ninth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

DAVID K. REYNOLDS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 425) for the relief of David K. Reynolds.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the charge of desertion standing against David K. Reynolds, late a member of Company K, Sixty-first Ohio, be, and the same is hereby, removed.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Add at the end of the bill the following: "Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

HENRY COOK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 417) for the relief of Henry Cook.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. TALBERT. I should like to have the report read in this case.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report, but before the reading was concluded

Mr. TALBERT said: I ask that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection that order will be made.

There was no objection.

GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS THOMPSON.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 8474) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Gustavus Adolphus Thompson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Gustavus Adolphus Thompson, late private in Company B, Ninth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and to issue to said Thompson an honorable discharge from said service to be dated July 12, 1865.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs was read, as follows:

At the end of the bill add the following:

"Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act."

Mr. TALBERT. I ask that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I desire that the bill be considered. I am familiar with the facts of the case; and I think that after I have made an explanation the gentleman from South Carolina will not object.

Mr. TALBERT. Very well; I withdraw the motion.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Does the gentleman desire to hear an explanation?

Mr. TALBERT. Yes, sir.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The history of this case is about as follows: On the 14th of August, 1861, Gustavus Adolphus Thompson enlisted as a private in Company D, Ninth Regiment Indiana Infantry Volunteers. When his first term of service had expired he reenlisted and continued in the service until the 12th of July, 1865. He participated in all the engagements in which that regiment took part during the entire civil war. At the time of his original enlistment no bounties were being offered. In 1862 he was seriously wounded and was in the hospital several weeks.

Early in July, 1865, while his regiment was stationed at Nashville, Tenn., he had some difficulty with his captain. In consequence, as I believe, of a "spree" that several members of the company got on, he was put under arrest. Shortly afterwards the regiment was ordered to Texas for duty in connection with certain complications down in Mexico. When the regiment reached New Orleans, he heard from home that his wife was sick. Being under arrest, he conferred with the lieutenant-colonel of his regiment in regard to going home. That officer told him to go home. This man says—and I think the evidence shows it and the report recites it—that the lieutenant-colonel furnished him with money with which to go home. Accordingly, he went to his home in Indiana. When he had been there about three weeks, his regiment returned to Indianapolis and was mustered out. He was not there. He was reported as a deserter. Under the general law, if a soldier was not under charges at the time he abandoned the service, his record can be readily corrected.

General Shuman, the brigade commander, and also the lieutenant-colonel of the Ninth Regiment, who was acting brigade commander at the time of the alleged desertion, have stated the facts fully. The testimony is that this man was as brave a soldier as there was in the regiment. He did not abandon his regiment until after the war was over. General Shuman has said that the charges against him were trivial, and that he intended to relieve him from arrest when the regiment reached Texas.

This man has suffered for thirty-five years the stigma and humiliation of the charge of desertion. On this account he has been kept out of Grand Army posts. It occurs to me that he has been sufficiently punished. He asks now that the Government in its generosity forgive this one mistake and grant him an honorable discharge.

The question being taken, the amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

GEORGE F. WHITE.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 5898) granting an increase of pension to George F. White.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of George F. White, late of Company I, Third Wisconsin Volunteer Cavalry, at the rate of $24 per month, said pension to be in lieu of the one he now receives.

The following amendment, recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, was read:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of George F. White, late of Company I, Third Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $17 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

GERTRUDE B. WILKINSON.

The next business was the bill (S. 4441) granting an increase of pension to Gertrude B. Wilkinson.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Gertrude B. Wilkinson, widow of Melville C. Wilkinson, late captain, Third Regiment United States Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The following amendment, recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, was read:

In line 8 strike out "forty" and insert "thirty."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

SARAH HERRIMAN.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 7024) granting a pension to Sarah Herriman.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sarah Herriman, widow of Hezekiah Herriman, late sergeant of Company E, First United States Dragoons, war with Mexico, and pay her a pension of $12 per month, the same to be in lieu of that she now receives.

The following amendments, recommended by the Committee on Pensions, were read:

In line 6, after the words "Hezekiah Herriman," insert "alias Charles Clifford."

In line 8, after the word "pension," insert "at the rate."

In line 9 strike out "the same to be," and in the same line strike out "now receives" and insert "is now receiving."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Sarah Herriman."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JESSE F. GATES.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 8415) granting an increase of pension to Jesse F. Gates.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill 4742, which is similar in its nature, be substituted for this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that Senate bill 4742 be substituted for the House bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill S. 4742 was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jesse F. Gates, late of Battery A, Second Regiment United States Artillery, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I move that the bill H. R. 8415 be ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

ANNIE C. COLLIER.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 2816) granting a pension to Annie C. Collier.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Annie C. Collier, as widow of Thomas S. Collier, late of the United States Navy.

The following amendments, recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, were read:

In line 6 strike out "as."

In lines 6 and 7 strike out "of the" and insert "boatswain."

Add to the end of the bill the words "and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

LUKE P. ALLPHIN.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 9177) to grant an increase of pension to Luke P. Allphin.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Luke P. Allphin, late first sergeant Company E, First Illinois Volunteers, in the Mexican war, at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of the rate he is now receiving.

The following amendments, recommended by the Committee on Pensions, were read:

Change the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Luke P. Allphin."

After the word "war," in line 7, insert "and pay him a pension."

In lines 7 and 8 strike out "twenty-four" and insert "twelve."

In line 9 strike out "the rate" and insert "that."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ANN E. CLUKE.

The next business was the bill (S. 2834) granting an increase of pension to Ann E. Cluke.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Ann E. Cluke, widow of James W. Cluke, late of Company I, Second Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, war with Mexico, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

HENRY B. SHELL.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 9903) granting an increase of pension to Henry Shell.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Henry Shell, late of company—in the war with Mexico, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The following amendments, recommended by the Committee on Pensions, were read:

In line 6, before the word "company," insert "Captain James F. Preston's," and fill the blank space in that line with the words "First Virginia Volunteers."

In line 7 strike out "thirty" and insert "sixteen."

Change the claimant's name where it appears in the title and the body of the bill to "Henry B. Shell."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ADELLA M. ANTHONY.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 9382) granting a pension to Adella M. Anthony.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

The following amendment, recommended by the Committee on Pensions, was read:

Strike out all after the words "widow of," in line 6, and insert "Amory K. Johnson, private of Company F, Fourth Illinois Volunteers, war with Mexico, and lieutenant-colonel Fourteenth Illinois Infantry Volunteers, and colonel Twenty-eighth Illinois Infantry Volunteers, in the civil war, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

CHARLOTTE W. DREW.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 10521) granting a pension to Charlotte W. Drew.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the corresponding Senate bill (S. 5093) be substituted for the House bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the corresponding Senate bill (S. 5093) be substituted for the House bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill S. 5093 was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Charlotte W. Drew, widow of Alfred W. Drew, late first lieutenant Company I, Twelfth Regiment United States Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The following amendment recommended by the Committee on Pensions was read:

In line 8 strike out "forty" and insert "twenty-five."

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, just a moment. This is a bill which has just passed the Senate, to pay Mrs. Charlotte W. Drew, widow of Charles Drew, who was lately killed while commanding his company in a battle in the island of Luzon, a pension of $40 a month. The Senate has generously accorded her a pension of $40 a month, and I request that the amendment be disagreed to, and that the bill as it passed the Senate be adopted by this committee.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I want to say that this widow is now drawing $17 a month. The amendment of the Committee on Pensions increases that to $25 a month, which is an increase of over 50 per cent on that which the regular law allows. There was no testimony before the committee as to any unusual conditions which would appeal exceptionally to the committee in this case. It has been the rule of the committee in cases of this kind not to exceed the maximum amount of $25, so that the Committee on Pensions have given to the widow of this lieutenant the maximum amount that they allow in such cases. I do not see any extraordinary condition which could be given as a reason why this rule of the Committee on Pensions, and practically the rule of this House in acting on the recommendations of that committee, should be departed from in this instance.

Mr. HAWLEY. May I ask the indulgence of the committee for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HAWLEY. This soldier who sacrificed his life for his country was a first lieutenant in the Regular Army, but he died as a captain. That is, he was commanding his company, and as far as I know there has never been an instance in this House where a soldier died the heroic death which this man died where the pension has not been advanced to a higher figure than that prescribed by the rule of the committee which the gentleman represents.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. The gentleman is not possessed of full information on that subject, then.

Mr. HAWLEY. I appeal to the gentleman to know if there have not been many instances in which the rule has been disregarded, and where a higher pension has been granted? This case is peculiar in the fact that the widow is without any other means of support whatever, and the sum of $40 a month will go a very little way toward supporting her and raising the two children dependent on her for support.

I desire to lay particular stress on the fact that Lieutenant Drew had been advanced to the command of his company, and under the orders of his commander in chief was then acting in that capacity, and not in the capacity of a first lieutenant, to which alone the rule applies. I hope the committee will consent to the same sum which the Senate accorded.

The Senate amendment was read, as follows:

In line 8, strike out "forty" and insert "twenty-five."

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HAWLEY) there were—ayes 19, noes 7.

Accordingly, the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

HENRY COOK.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, House bill 417, Calendar No. 1262, was laid aside at the request of a member. I ask now to return to that number and take up that bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Henry Cook, late of Company G, Thirty-fifth Regiment of New York Volunteer Infantry, and of Company C, Twentieth Regiment of Volunteer New York Cavalry, and to grant him an honorable discharge from the service first above named.

The following amendment recommended by the committee was read:

Add at the end of the bill the following:

"Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ELIZABETH W. ELDRIDGE.

The next business was the bill (S. 4054) granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth W. Eldridge.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth W. Eldridge, widow of Bogardus Eldridge, late captain, Fourteenth Regiment United States Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving, with an additional allowance of $2 per month on account of each of the three minor children of said Bogardus Eldridge.

The following amendment recommended by the committee was read:

In line 8 strike out "forty" and insert "thirty," so as to read "thirty dollars."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Chairman, I move that House bill corresponding with the bill just passed be laid on the table.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the bill (H. R. 10521) will be reported to the House with the recommendation that it lie on the table.

There was no objection.

MARY J. D. M'GLENSEY.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 9672) to increase the pension of Mrs. M. McGlensey, widow of Capt. John F. McGlensey, of the United States Navy.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Mrs. M. McGlensey, widow of Capt. John F. McGlensey, of the United States Navy, at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of $30 per month, the rate she is now receiving.

The following amendments, recommended by the committee, were read:

In line 4, after the word "roll," insert "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

In line 5 strike out "Mrs. M." and substitute therefor "Mary J. D."

Strike out all in the bill after the word "Navy," in line 6, and substitute therefor the words "and pay her a pension at the rate of $35 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

MRS. MATTIE OTIS DICKINSON.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 296) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Mattie Otis Dickinson.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mattie Otis Dickinson, widow of Capt. Walter Mason Dickinson, late of the Seventeeth Regiment of Infantry, United States Army, who died near Santiago de Cuba, July 2, 1898, from wounds received at El Caney the previous day, and pay her a pension from and after the passage of this act at the rate of $50 a month in lieu of her present pension.

The following amendments, recommended by the committee, were read:

Strike out of lines 8, 9, and 10 the words "who died near Santiago de Cuba July 2, 1898, from wounds received at El Caney the previous day."

In line 11 strike out "from and after the passage of this act;" and in the same line strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty."

In line 12 strike out "her present pension" and insert "in lieu of that she is now receiving."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

LAURA P. LEE.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 191) granting a pension to Laura P. Lee.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place the name of Laura P. Lee, widow of George Lee, late major and assistant adjutant-general of volunteers and brevet lieutenant-colonel, upon the pension roll at the rate of $25 per month.

The following amendments, recommended by the Committee, were read:

In line 4, after the word "place," insert "on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

Strike out all in the bill after the word "Lee," in line 5, and insert in lieu thereof "late first lieutenant of Company K, Twenty-first Regiment United States Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $25 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

EDWARD M'DUFFEY.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 2399) granting an increase of pension to Edward McDuffey.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Edward McDuffey, late a coppersmith in the United States Navy, on the steamer Marion, and pay him a pension of $50 per month in lieu of that he now receives.

The following amendments, recommended by the committee, were read:

In line 4, after the word "roll," insert "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

In line 6, after the word "pension," insert "at the rate," and in the same line strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty."

In line 7 strike out "now receives" and insert "is now receiving."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

MARY EMILY WILCOX.

The next business was the bill (S. 4574) granting an increase of pension to Mary Emily Wilcox.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary Emily Wilcox, widow of John A. Wilcox, late lieutenant-colonel Second Regiment Mississippi Volunteers, war with Mexico, and pay her a pension at the rate of $15 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The following amendment, recommended by the committee, was read:

In line 8 strike out "fifteen" and insert "twelve."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

CHARLES E. HOFMANN.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 10423) granting an honorable discharge to Charles E. Hofmann, late first lieutenant in Company H, Sixtieth Regiment of United States Colored Infantry.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to revoke and set aside the provision in Special Orders, No. 110, Headquarters Department of Arkansas, dated Little Rock, Ark., May 8, 1865, dishonorably discharging from the military service of the United States Charles E. Hofmann, first lieutenant of Company H, Sixtieth Regiment of United States Colored Infantry, and to order and cause to be issued to him an honorable discharge as of date May 8, 1865: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other allowance shall become due or payable by reason of the passage of this act.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that does not properly come before this committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

CHARLES SCHAUPP.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 9271) to remove the charge of desertion against Charles Schaupp, alias Phillip Schaupp, and authorizing his honorable discharge.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to remove the charge of desertion against Charles Schaupp, alias Phillip Schaupp, late a private soldier in Company E, of the First New York Cavalry, and to issue to said soldier an honorable discharge.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Add the following at the end of the bill: "Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act."

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I move that that bill be passed over without prejudice.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

WILLIAM BURKE.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 4020) for the relief of William Burke.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion now standing against the name of William Burke, late of Company K, Ninety-sixth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and issue to him an honorable discharge.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Add the following at the end of the bill: "Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act."

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

JAMES DONAHUE.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 6492) to correct the military record of James Donahue.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion against James Donahue, late a private in Company G, First Nebraska Volunteer Regiment, who also served under the name of James Cullen in Company A, Ninety-ninth Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and received an honorable discharge.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that that bill be passed over without prejudice.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

NICHOLAS SWINGLE.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 2464) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Nicholas Swingle.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Nicholas Swingle, late of Company E, Seventy-eighth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and that an honorable discharge be issued in lieu thereof, to date September 15, 1864.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Add at the end of the bill the following: "Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act."

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I ask if the gentleman who introduced that bill is present? If not, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his request and let the report be read. This is a meritorious case.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. TALBERT. I did not hear that statement. I gave way for the gentleman to make a statement.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I have asked that the report be read, Mr. Chairman.

The report (by Mr. ESCH) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2464) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Nicholas Swingle, report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass with the following amendment: By adding, after line 8, a proviso as follows: "Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Matthew McDonald."

Mr. TALBERT. I would like to have the report read in the case unless some gentleman is present to make a statement about it.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2395) granting an increase of pension to Matthew McDonald, submit the following report:

This bill proposes to increase the pension of this soldier from $24 to $50 per month.

The records of the War Department show that this soldier served as a private in Company L, Eighty-third New York Infantry, from September 4, 1861, to November 17, 1862, when he was discharged on surgeon's certificate of disability by reason of partial anchylosis of the left elbow joint, with atrophy of the muscles, existing, in some degree, before enlistment. His claim for pension under the general law, based on malarial poisoning and disease of eyes, and filed August 19, 1882, was allowed in March, 1885, at the rate of $10 per month from August 19, 1882, and $14 per month from April 3, 1884, on account of malarial poisoning and disease of eyes, with total loss of sight of right and partial loss of sight of left eye, and this rating was increased to $24 per month from January 19, 1887.

His claim for increase of pension, in which nervous debility and disease of lungs were alleged as resulting causes, and filed September 24, 1897, was rejected October 19, 1898, upon the ground that the disability from the pensioned causes did not warrant a rating in excess of $24 per month, and that nervous debility and disease of lungs could not be accepted as results. Subsequent to the rejection of this claim the beneficiary filed the testimony of Dr. Ferguson, of Manchester, N. H., to the effect that from an extended personal and professional observation, covering a period of over twenty-five years as a family physician of the soldier, he was satisfied and entirely safe in asserting that the nervous debility and disease of lungs from which the soldier was suffering was a direct result of malarial poisoning; that the patient suffered from malarial toxæmia of long duration and subject to oft recurring attacks, manifesting strong symptoms of poisoning; and where this condition extends over a long period of years there is unquestionably produced as a result of the weakening and debilitating cause structural and organic changes taking place sooner or later and ending in incurable disease; that this is the soldier's case, and that he is now so affected that he is obliged to confine himself to the house and requires partial care and attendance; that deponent can assign no other cause for this condition than the malaria permeating his system.

This affidavit was considered by the Pension Bureau on January 24, 1899, and the result of such consideration was that that Bureau held that the same could not be taken to controvert the certificate of medical examination of the board of surgeons at Manchester on June 15, 1898; that this certificate shows no disease of lungs whatever and but very little evidence of malarial poisoning; and that the existing disease of the nervous system and paralysis agitans could not be accepted as a result of malarial poisoning, malaria never being accepted as a causative factor in producing paralysis agitans; that it is the province of the Pension Bureau to determine the pathological or nonpathological relation between pensioned causes and alleged results; and that if such relation was not accepted, the Bureau was not required to assign or suggest the cause of such disabilities.

Mr. GIBSON. I hope the gentleman from South Carolina will not require the balance of the report read. The man is blind and paralyzed in both hands and has the consumption. This is a $72 case.

Mr. TALBERT. I will not ask for the further reading of the report.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

FRANCES M. CELLAR.

The next business was the bill (S. 4261) granting a pension to Frances M. Cellar.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the attention of this House to a bill while the Clerk is getting another bill ready for action—Calender No. 1498. It is a bill that will evidently not be reached in the regular order. It is in favor of Col. J. P. C. Shanks, of Indiana. The bill was introduced by Mr. CROMER, of Indiana. The Colonel is drawing $30 a month now, and this is only an increase to $50. He is one of Indiana's honored citizens, a former member of this House. He served with ability in this House, and his country with distinction as colonel of the Seventh Indiana. He has a long and honorable service; is now old and dependent, paralyzed, confined to his room, and requires constant attention. I ask as a special favor of the committee that this bill be considered at this time. It would be an act of justice to an honored citizen and brave soldier.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the number of the bill?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. The number of the bill is H. R. 498.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I will be obliged to object to changing the order on the Calendar. Another gentleman has been to me for the same purpose, and I have had to decline to accede to his request.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I will renew the request a little later. I very much desire it to pass at this meeting.

EVA CLARK.

The next business was the bill (S. 1588) granting a pension to Eva Clark.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Eva Clark, former widow of Joseph L. C. Hill, late of Company C, Thirtieth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN R. JOY.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 429) to increase the pension of John R. Joy, Company H, Thirty-ninth Iowa Infantry.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place the name of John R. Joy, late of Company H, Thirty-ninth Iowa Infantry, on the pension roll of the United States at the rate of $50 per month, subject to the regulations of the Pension Office, said pension to be in lieu of the pension he is now drawing.

The following amendment, recommended by the committee, was read:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John R. Joy, late of Company H, Thirty-ninth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

LINSAY C. JONES.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 3784) granting an increase of pension to Linsay C. Jones.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee now rise and report the bills to the House——

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I wish the gentleman from Tennessee would withhold his motion.

Mr. GIBSON. I will do so, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I ask that the bill (H. R. 12620) granting an increase of pension to John P. C. Shanks be taken up and considered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that House bill 12620, granting an increase of pension to John P. C. Shanks, be considered by the committee. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John P. C. Shanks, colonel of the Seventh Indiana Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the report in the case be printed in the RECORD. I will not ask to have it read at this time. I desire to thank the House for this courtesy; it is an act of justice to an old and meritorious citizen who can not live long to enjoy the bounty of a just Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the report be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 12630) granting an increase of pension to John P. C. Shanks, submit the following report:

This bill proposes to increase the pension of John P. C. Shanks, late colonel of the Seventh Indiana Cavalry, from $30 to $50 per month.

This officer, now 75 years of age, is shown by the records of the War Department to have served as colonel and additional aid-de-camp on the staff of General Fremont from March 31, 1862, to October, 1863, and to have been mustered in as colonel of the Seventh Indiana Cavalry October 9, 1863; to have been brevetted brigadier-general of United States Volunteers, and to have been mustered out September 19, 1865. And these records further show that he was granted a leave of absence for twenty days in August, 1864, on surgeon's certificate, on account of remittent fever and emphysema of the lungs; that he was again granted leave of absence in June, 1865, on account of enfeebled condition of the system, the result of an attack of bilious remittent fever, and that this leave of absence was extended upon surgeon's certificate of disability dated July 13, 1865, which showed him to be suffering from chronic torpidity of the liver and general debility.

He first applied for pension on December 28, 1887, and was pensioned in 1889 under the general law at $15 per month, commencing December 28, 1887, on account of paralysis of the legs and disease of stomach; and this rating was increased to $30 per month from May 22, 1889, and he is now in receipt of that pension, claims for increase of pension filed in 1890, 1898, and 1900 having been rejected, the last one on October 12, 1900, upon the ground that a rating of $30 per month was fully commensurate with the degree of disability arising from the pensioned causes.

In his last application for increase of pension, filed May 31, 1900, he alleged that he is confined to his bed most of the time; that the paralysis of the legs has extended to the hips, and that he requires the periodical aid and attendance of another person; and in support of that claim filed the testimony of Dr. George W. Shepard, of Red Key, Ind., who testified as follows:

"I have carefully examined John P. C. Shanks, and find him afflicted with paralysis of both legs, which keeps him in bed nearly all of the time, and of necessity requires some one almost all the time to attend him. Once in a great while he attempts to get out of bed without assistance, and frequently falls as the result of his efforts. I also find limbs very much atrophied and extremely weak. Find heart's action very feeble and sluggish. There is tenderness of spine and at base of brain, and I find the least excitement overcomes him and affects him very much. I further find tenderness over region of stomach and transverse colon; also of right and left iliac regions, with marked tenderness over the region of liver and spine. I find claimant so severely afflicted that he requires some one to attend him almost all the time."

Certificate of medical examination of November 30, 1898, rated him $25 for the paralysis of legs, $25 for disease of stomach; and the board of surgeons then stated that by reason of such paralysis and disease of stomach the claimant requires the frequent and periodical aid and attendance of another person, and was entitled to $50 per month.

The last certificate of medical examination, made on July 6, 1900, rated him $30 for paralysis of legs, $8 for disease of stomach, $6 for disease of rectum, and $8 for disease of urinary organs; and that certificate further states as follows:

"Claimant is not confined to his bed or house at all times, but some of the time, from loss of energy. Needs assistance only in the way of waiting on him and keeping him in constant surveillance, to assist him if he gets into trouble. He is entirely incapacitated for any kind of labor; is gradually and steadily losing strength and weight, and these disabilities are permanent and will probably grow worse, as, in my opinion, he has locomotor ataxia."

And the paralysis of the legs is described in said certificate as follows:

"Slight anæsthesia of the skin of both legs from disease of hips; limbs symmetrical, but small; slight atrophy of muscles. Loss of coordination of muscles of legs in walking at all times; exaggerated when walking with eyes closed. Halts, staggers, and wabbles, and inclines to the left, with the eyes closed. Has loss of memory. Has attacks of vertigo. Three times in the last year has lost consciousness for from thirty minutes to several hours. Muscular movements feeble. Becomes tired greatly. If he starts to fall, can not catch himself."

It appears to your committee that this officer's disabilities of accepted service origin are such that periodical aid and attendance of another person must be essential, and hence adopts the recommendation made by the board of examining surgeons at Portland, Ind., of November 30, 1898, which recommended a rating of $50 per month, and reports the bill back with the recommendation that it pass after the same shall have been amended as follows:

In line 6, before the word "colonel," insert the word "late."

In the same line strike out the words "of the."

In the same line, before the word "Indiana," insert the word "Regiment."

In the same line, after the word "Indiana," insert the word "Volunteer."

The amendments recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions were agreed to.

The bill as amended was then laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the several bills to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. HEPBURN] having taken the chair, Mr. LACEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, reported that that committee had had under consideration sundry private bills and had directed him to report the same back to the House, some with amendments and some without amendments, and with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I move the previous question on each and all of the several bills and amendments to their final passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee moves the previous question on each and all the several bills and amendments to their final passage. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

On motion of Mr. GIBSON, by unanimous consent, a motion to reconsider the various votes by which bills reported from the Committee of the Whole House were passed was laid on the table.

ASHEL C. AULICK.

Mr. BERRY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 12233) granting a pension to Ashel C. Aulick. This is the case of a soldier of the Spanish war who is now lying very sick—paralyzed. The bill has been reported favorably by the Committee on Pensions. The proposed pension is only $15 a month. I have seen this man lying sick at his home.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place upon the United States pension roll the name of Ashel C. Aulick, Company H, Third Ohio Infantry, Spanish war, at the rate of $20 per month, subject to the restrictions and limitations of the United States general pension laws.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The following amendments reported by the Committee on Pensions were read and agreed to:

In line 3, after the word "Interior," insert "be, and he."

In line 4, after the word "roll," insert "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws;" and in same line strike out "United States."

Strike out all in the bill after line 5 and insert in lieu thereof the words "war with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $15 per month."

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of William H. Smith, Fifty-fifth Congress, no adverse report having been made.

And then, on motion of Mr. DALZELL (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing submitting an estimate of appropriation for office rent—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, January 12, 1901.

The Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, our Father, that through the growing influence of Thy Son and of Thy Holy Spirit the sentiment of brotherly kindness among men has grown and is increasing, and finds itself with emphatic expression in this the highest political body of the nation. And now, as we come about the lately open grave of the late eminent senior Senator from Minnesota to pay the tribute of respect and affection to his memory, may all the best and noblest traits of his character come out, and may we respond to them with genuine and affectionate admiration and appreciation.

Let Thy blessing rest upon all the Senators, those who are detained at home by infirmity and indisposition, those who are here and to be present, and may this be a memorable day in the history of the Senate as it engraves the name and recollection of our departed friend and brother high among the statesmen of the nation. We humbly pray, through Jesus Christ, our Savior. Amen.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following telegraphic memorial from the legislature of the State of California; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

[Telegram.]

STATE CAPITOL, Sacramento, Cal., January 10, 1901.

WILLIAM P. FRYE,
President of the Senate, Washington, D. C.:

I am directed by the senate of the State of California to transmit to you by telegraph the following joint resolution, No. 1, which was adopted by both houses of the California legislature on Tuesday, January 8, 1901. Kindly present same to your honorable body.

Senate joint resolution No. 1.

Whereas the quarantine which this State has maintained against the introduction of insects, pests, and plant disease had been of immeasurable benefit to our horticultural and agricultural interests; and

Whereas there is now before Congress a bill, which was introduced by Hon. Mr. WADSWORTH, and entitled "H. R. bill No. 96," and which bill provides for a national quarantine against such pests and plant diseases; and

Whereas the operation of this bill would be very beneficial to the horticultural interests, and especially to the citrus fruit industry: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate and assembly of the State of California jointly, That we respectfully but urgently request the Congress of the United States to enact said bill H. R. No. 96 at its present session, thereby securing to our horticultural interests immunity from further insect enemies, and to the citrus fruit growers freedom from the introduction of the orange fruit maggot.

Resolved, That the secretary of the senate be directed to immediately telegraph these resolutions to the honorable President of the Senate and the honorable Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States.

Faithfully, yours,

FRANK J. BRANDON,
Secretary of State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER presented the petition of Hon. George K. Nash, governor of Ohio, and of the Historical and Philosophical Society of Ohio, praying Congress to have copied and printed for distribution certain documents now in the archives of France, at Paris, relating to the territory acquired by the United States by the purchase of 1803, known as the Louisiana purchase; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. ALLEN presented a petition of sundry citizens of Aurora, Nebr., praying that an appropriation be made for the extension of free rural mail delivery; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition of the board of trustees of South Sioux City, Nebr., praying that an appropriation be made for the improvement of the navigation of the Missouri River at and immediately above that city; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of University Place and Valentine and of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Nebraska City, all in the State of Nebraska, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in Army canteens; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of University Place, Nebr., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors to native races in Africa; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented sundry petitions of citizens of Cuming County, York, and Greeley, all in the State of Nebraska, praying for the enactment of the so-called Grout bill, to regulate the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine; which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. NELSON presented a petition of sundry citizens of Stanton, Minn., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in Army canteens; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Freeborn County, Minn., praying for the enactment of the so-called Grout bill, to regulate the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. McLAURIN presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Charleston, S. C., praying that an appropriation be made to enlarge the scope of the Geological Survey, so as to include in its operations the forests of South Carolina and the Eastern States; which was referred to the Committee on the Geological Survey.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Charleston, S. C., praying for the establishment of a national forest reserve; which was referred to the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game.

Mr. TELLER presented a petition of the congregation of the First Baptist Church of Pueblo, Colo., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in all Government buildings and institutions under Government control; which was referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico.

Mr. McCOMAS presented the petition of Wilbur B. Mallalieu, of Baltimore, Md., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors to native races in Africa, in Army canteens, in the Philippines, and in the Territory of Alaska, etc.; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of Cloakmakers' Union No. 1, of Baltimore, Md., praying for the enactment of legislation to regulate the hours of daily labor of workmen and mechanics, and also to protect free labor from prison competition; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens and of the Woman's Baptist Home Mission Society, all of Baltimore, in the State of Maryland, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the memorial of W. H. Thompson, jr., president of the National Live Stock Exchange, remonstrating against the enactment of the so-called Grout bill, to regulate the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported an amendment proposing an appropriation of $50,000, to be expended under the direction of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, for the erection and equipment of a power house and nurses' home to be erected at Providence Hospital, intended to be proposed to the District of Columbia appropriation bill, accompanied by a report thereon, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and printed; which was agreed to.

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF DARDANELLE, ARK.

Mr. MARTIN. I am directed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 827) for the relief of the trustees of the Presbyterian Church of Dardanelle, Yell County, Ark., to report it favorably without amendment, adopting the House report thereon.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, if there is no objection, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that the bill may be considered at this time.

Mr. KEAN. Let the bill be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be investigated by the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army the circumstances, character, and extent of the damages by United States troops during the late war to the church building and grounds of the Presbyterian Church of Dardanelle, Yell County, Ark., and the actual value of the material taken from the building and grounds, and to find and award and to certify to the Secretary of the Treasury what amount, if any, is equitably due to the trustees of said church from the United States as the reasonable value of the material taken and used; and the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to said trustees, or their successors, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the amount, if any, so found to be due from the United States, and not to exceed $2,000; and the acceptance by said trustees of any sum paid under the provisions hereof shall be in full satisfaction of all claim, of every name and nature, for occupation and damage, or in any manner arising or growing out of the same.

Mr. SCOTT. I should like to have the report of the committee read, so as to show upon what recommendation the bill is to be passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. HENRY of Mississippi from the Committee on War Claims of the House of Representatives January 30, 1900, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 827) for the relief of the trustees of the Presbyterian Church of Dardanelle, Yell County, Ark., beg leave to submit the following report, and recommend that said bill do pass without amendment.

The evidence submitted shows that the church building was taken possession of by United States troops in 1864 and 1865, the building torn down, taken away, and used for military and army purposes.

In accordance with precedent, it seems to be the policy of Congress and the War Department to place churches in the same condition as when they were taken possession of by the United States, natural wear and tear excepted, or allow a reasonable amount in money in lieu of such repairs, but the committee is not willing that the value of such use and occupation shall be fixed by ex parte affidavits and without investigation by the proper department of the Government.

The committee therefore report the bill, referring the claim to the War Department for investigation, and recommend its passage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JULIA CRENSHAW.

Mr. CLAY. I ask that the bill (S. 5019) granting an increase of pension to Julia Crenshaw be taken up and passed. It will not take exceeding half a minute.

The Secretary read the bill; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 9, before the word "dollars," to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "fifty;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Julia Crenshaw, widow of Frank F. Crenshaw, late captain of Company A, Twenty-eighth Regiment United States Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REV. WILLIAM T. M'ELROY.

Mr. LINDSAY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3020) for the relief of Rev. William T. McElroy.

The Secretary read the bill; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to pay to Rev. William T. McElroy, late of Louisville, Ky., $265.20, being for rent of ground at Louisville, Ky., during the late war for the suppression of the rebellion.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5350) for the establishment of a subport of entry at Douglas, Ariz.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I demand the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota objects and demands the regular order, which is the introduction of bills and joint resolutions.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FOSTER introduced a bill (S. 5542) to provide an American register for the steamship Manauense and the ships Antiope and Balclutha; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SCOTT introduced a bill (S. 5543) for the relief of the estate of R. McChesney, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5544) for the relief of the estate of J. H. McChesney, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. McLAURIN introduced a bill (S. 5545) for the relief of the estate of Christopher W. Dudley, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. McENERY introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (S. 5546) for the relief of the estate of François Lagleize, deceased;

A bill (S. 5547) for the relief of the estate of Peter and Margaret Turner, deceased; and

A bill (S. 5548) for the relief of Mrs. M. L. H. Blanchard.

Mr. NELSON introduced a bill (S. 5549) granting an increase of pension to Horatio N. Davis; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McCOMAS introduced a bill (S. 5550) granting an increase of pension to Henry B. Schroeder; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5551) to waive and release all claims of the United States by way of escheat to the real estate in the District of Columbia of which Patrick Kavanagh or his sons, Charles W. Kavanagh and William Kavanagh, died seized; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (S. 5552) for the relief of Mrs. Mary Shannon, widow of Joseph R. Shannon, deceased, and administratrix of his estate (with an accompanying paper);

A bill (S. 5553) for the relief of Thomas N. Gott (with an accompaning paper); and

A bill (S. 5554) for the relief of Eugene L. Derr, administrator the estate of John Derr, deceased.

Mr. WARREN introduced a bill (S. 5555) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii," approved April 30, 1900; which was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. No; the original bill came from the Committee on Foreign Relations. I should think it should be referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To what committee does the Senator from Wyoming desire to have the bill referred?

Mr. WARREN. I assumed that the Chair would know what committee would properly have charge of the matter. I had thought the Committee on Territories, as Hawaii is a Territory; but I have no preference.

Mr. LODGE. It should be referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Committee on Territories would naturally be the proper committee, but there was created, as the Senator is aware, a special committee upon Pacific Islands and Porto Rico.

Mr. WARREN. Let the bill go to that committee, then.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so referred, unless otherwise directed by the Senate. It is so ordered.

Mr. STEWART. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to have considered a very important bill.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I insist on the regular order, Mr. President. I shall object.

Mr. STEWART. I understand that the Calendar is in order, as we have gotten through with the morning business.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The morning business is not closed, and I insist on the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is demanded. If there are no further bills or joint resolutions, concurrent or other resolutions are next in order.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. MALLORY submitted an amendment providing for the improvement of the Cypress Top River north of the Choctawhatchee River, Florida, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARRIS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 3369) to put in force in the Indian Territory certain provisions of the laws of Arkansas relating to corporations, and to make said provisions applicable to said Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

STATIONERY ROOM OF THE SENATE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. MORGAN, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate shall have the control of the officers of the stationery room of the Senate so as to inquire into and, from time to time, to report upon the conduct thereof.

Mr. HALE. As the Senator from Alabama is not present, I ask that the resolution may go over, retaining its place, until Monday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection such will be taken as the sense of the Senate. The resolution will go over, retaining its place, until Monday.

Mr. NELSON. Is the morning business disposed of?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inquire if there is any further morning business? There being none, the Senator from Minnesota is recognized for the purpose of proceeding with the special order.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR DAVIS.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolutions.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That it is with deep regret and profound sorrow that the Senate hears the announcement of the death of Hon. CUSHMAN KELLOGG DAVIS, late a Senator from the State of Minnesota.

Resolved, That the Senate extends to his family and to the people of the State of Minnesota sincere condolence in their bereavement.

Resolved, That, as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the business of the Senate be now suspended to enable his associates to pay fitting tribute to his high character and distinguished services.

Resolved, That the Secretary transmit to the family of the deceased and to the governor of the State of Minnesota a copy of these resolutions, with the action of the Senate thereon.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That, as an additional mark of respect, at the conclusion of these exercises the Senate do adjourn.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, Senator CUSHMAN KELLOGG DAVIS, of Minnesota, died in the sixty-third year of his age, at his home in St. Paul, on the 27th day of November, A. D. 1900, after a lingering sickness of more than two months. He died in the public service, in the full maturity of his great mental vigor, at a time when he was better equipped than ever to serve his country, and at a time when his country stood in need of his sound judgment, profound wisdom, and vast experience in public affairs.

He was born at Henderson, Jefferson County, N. Y., on the 16th day of June, A. D. 1838. On his maternal side he was a direct descendant of Mary Allerton, the last survivor of that heroic band that landed from the Mayflower, and his paternal ancestry was also of good Puritan stock. When he was 2 months old his parents moved to the neighborhood of Waukesha, Wis., where his father engaged in the pursuit of farming for the next fifteen years, during which period he led the usual life of a farmer's son on the farm.

He was an intellectual and highly gifted youth, and his vigorous mental faculties were trained and developed in the district school, in Carroll College, and in Michigan University, from whence he graduated in 1857. He immediately thereafter took up and followed the study of the law, became a member of the Waukesha bar in 1859, and remained in active practice till 1862, when he entered the Army as first lieutenant of Company B, of the Twenty-eighth Wisconsin Regiment, in the civil war. He served with distinction in the Army until 1864, when, on account of poor health, he was compelled to resign.

In 1865 he moved to St. Paul, Minn., and took up the practice of the law, and soon became noted as one of the ablest, most prominent, and most eloquent members of the bar, with a large and lucrative practice.

He was a member of the legislature in 1867, United States attorney for Minnesota from 1868 until 1873, and governor of the State in 1874 and 1875. He was one of the regents of the State University from 1882 till 1898, and in 1887 was elected United States Senator, and reelected in 1893 and 1899. He was chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations in the United States Senate from March, 1897, till his death, and was one of the commissioners who negotiated the treaty of Paris with Spain.

This, in brief, is the mere outer shell of his extensive public career, and gives us but a scant clew to his greatness and worth. To trace his life, the development of his vigorous mind, and its wonderful resources from youth to manhood, from a great lawyer to a profound statesman and leader, is to scan a human epic, marvelous and inspiring in its progress and grand and enduring in its results and outcome. He was equipped with a mind of the first order, eager, thirsty, and searching. In his youth he was a most ardent and omnivorous student, to whom his lessons were but the doorsteps to the great sanctuary of knowledge, which he was ever exploring. He became a devouring student of history, philosophy, and poetry at a time when most youths are tethered to their arithmetic, their grammar, and their geography. And so it came to pass that when he finally parted with his alma mater he carried away with him a much richer and a much greater wealth of human knowledge than that embraced in the college curriculum.

The trend of his mind and its comprehensive development inevitably turned him to the legal profession, and it was in this field that he first made his mark and first scored his great victories. He was a most profound lawyer, who mastered the great fundamental principles of the law that govern human affairs, and he had the intuitive faculty to correctly apply these to the manifold transactions of an ever-expanding civilization. In practice he was always ready and always a complete master of the evidence, the facts, and the law of his case, and his eloquence was of a character to instruct, impress, and convince both court and jury, and he was equally at home and equally strong both in a nisi prius and in an appellate court. I can truthfully bear witness to these facts, for it has been my privilege to contend with him at the bar and to hear him while I was sitting as one of the judges in a court of impeachment.

When he was first elected to the Senate he was easily and without dispute the foremost member of the bar in Minnesota. And though he was a most busy lawyer, he never allowed the law to congeal the innate kindness of his noble and sympathetic heart. He was always kind and helpful to the young and struggling practitioner, and he never turned away a penniless client who had a meritorious case. He loved the profession, and he was beloved and admired by his associates, young and old. Few lawyers can point to a grander, a more successful, or a nobler career at the bar.

Though absorbed in his profession and ever a busy lawyer, he nevertheless always kept in touch with public affairs, and was always ready to lead and to guide the impulse and heart of our people in their aspirations for relief and reform. I well remember when, in the early seventies, there was a great uprising among the people of the Northwest against the exactions of the railroads, how he became the acknowledged leader of the movement and how, in his great speech, entitled "Modern feudalism," he voiced in most eloquent and convincing terms the grievances complained of and the reforms desired by the masses of the people. That speech, which he delivered in many places, and his attitude on those great questions of public concern led him into the governor's chair, came near sending him to the United States Senate at that time, and forever endeared him to all our people, who from that day never ceased to have confidence in his integrity, his wisdom, and his honesty of purpose. While the movement which he thus led did not result in all the relief and reforms he and the masses hoped for, yet it resulted in establishing the fact, which had been in dispute, that railroad corporations are the servants of the public and are amenable to public control.

After one term in the executive chair he again resumed his calling as a lawyer, with more success and greater vigor than ever before. And in the meanwhile, though not in office, he remained one of the acknowledged leaders of the Republican party in the State, and was always ready and active to battle for the cause and for the best interests of the people.

In 1887, in obedience to a universal and pressing demand of our people, the legislature elected him to the United States Senate. And he came here, in the maturity of his great power and vast experience, better equipped and better fitted for the great work before him than most men who enter the Senate. He came here in middle life, with a most vigorous mind, an accomplished lawyer, a profound student, and a learned scholar, well versed in public affairs. He at once became prominent and one of the leaders of the Senate, but it was not until he became chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations and our controversy with Spain became acute that his true forum was found and his great abilities were given that field of statesmanship and diplomacy for which he was so well gifted and equipped. In that place and in that field he was easily the first and our recognized leader and guide. No one was better versed than he in the diplomatic history of our country, and no one had studied more deeply and was more familiar than he with all the complicated and varied relations of our country with foreign nations.

His speeches and his reports on our relations with England, with Spain, on our war with Spain, and on the treaty of Paris were epics of wisdom and eloquence scarcely ever excelled. He exhausted and rendered clear and lucid the most profound and most intricate problems of diplomacy and statecraft. When he had spoken there was little, if anything, more to be said on the subject. While he seemed listless and indifferent to the mere routine work of the Senate, yet when great questions were at stake and great problems were to be solved, he was always vigilant and always on the alert. He studied and passed upon public affairs, both at home and abroad, with the instinct and purpose of a statesman, and never in the spirit of a mere timeserver or politician. His entire heart and his whole soul were wrapped up in his great work, and he was so absorbed by it that he seemed at times oblivious to all else. He was an orator of the highest and best type, clothing the most profound thoughts in the most choice and most chaste of rhetoric. His speeches, unlike most orators', were even more impressive, more captivating, and more convincing in the reading of them than in the delivery. In his case the hearing served to whet the appetite for the reading of his speeches, and the reader always discovered beauties of thought and diction that had escaped him in the delivery. His oratory was classic, but of a modern type, fraught with facts and arguments of the most convincing and exhaustive character.

While his work at the bar and in the public service absorbed most of his time and attention, yet he always devoted a share of his time to the pursuit and study of literature and history. He was a profound Shakespearean scholar, thoroughly familiar with the life and all the works of that great genius. His book entitled The Law in Shakespeare shows how thoroughly he entered into the spirit and how fully he mastered and understood the broad and profound range of human knowledge and human wisdom possessed by that great high priest of tragedy, comedy, and song. He not only discovered the "law" in Shakespeare, but he also fathomed that profound analysis of the motives and mainsprings of human action so preeminent in the great poet.

He himself of an heroic turn of mind, he naturally and irresistibly became attracted to that most wonderful and most startling of modern heroes, Napoleon. He was one of the most thorough and most profound students of the life, the mission, and the work of this great man—familiar with every phase of it so far as known to human vision. There was scarcely a book upon Napoleon, in English or in French, that he did not have in his library and had not read and mastered. The study of the life of the great hero in all its varied phases charmed him, chastened him, and buoyed his spirit in the somber and perplexing moments of his life. There are trying and tempestuous moments in the lives of men when the music of the hurricane is a solace, a relief, and a rest. To him Napoleon was the spirit in that mighty whirlwind that crushed the feudalism of ages and paved the way to the democracy of modern times. He dearly loved a good novel, not so much for the mere story as for the insight it afforded him of mental and moral evolutions, and especially for the great relief and rest it gave him from the study of the difficult and profound problems entailed upon him as a lawyer, a legislator, and a statesman. Many a long and weary night, when he was too tired to sleep, he bathed his aching brows and found relief in Dickens, Thackeray, Bryant, Elliott, Cooper, Irving, Scott, and other great novelists. These were a sweet lullaby to his weary but restless spirit.

In the field of history he was a profound student and a great explorer, with a tenacious memory and a discriminating and analytic judgment. He was versed in the history of all the leading nations of ancient and modern times, and he was especially familiar with and at home in the history of our own country, of England, and of France. His great knowledge in this field was a supplement to his training as a lawyer, and it was because he was thus doubly equipped that he was so thorough, exhaustive, and effective in diplomacy and all that pertained to our foreign affairs.

The society that charmed him most and to which he was most devoted was his fine and extensive collection of books in his own library. Here he felt thoroughly at home and was never lonesome. His books were a part of his life, and his dear associates. Here, more than anywhere else, he loved to meet his friends, to converse with them on literature, history, and affairs of State, and to introduce them to his mute companions. Here he seemed possessed of an inspiration that made him more charming and nearer and dearer to his friends than anywhere else. It was his holy of holies, sacred to him, and, because of that fact, sacred to those who communed with him there.

His patriotism was of the loftiest and purest kind. He loved his country, not as a heathen loves his idol, but as a parent loves his child. He loved his country because it is noble and just and because it is the home of liberty, tempered with law, wholesome, blessed, and untarnished. He abhorred all show and sham, and scorned all posing and display. There was nothing trifling nor fictitious in his nature. He was sincere, conscientious, and fearless, both in private and public life, and while he was most kind and approachable to all, yet he was choice and deliberate in his friendships. He looked for loyalty and good faith, and once assured of that he yielded his whole heart and his whole soul, under all emergencies, to his friends. To me he was on all occasions most kind and helpful.

I feel his loss most deeply. His death has left a void in my heart which none can fill. We all miss him in the Senate—miss him for his goodness, kindness, and great worth; miss him for his wisdom, his eloquence, and noble example. His death was a great bereavement, not only to his friends and to his associates, but to the entire country. There are some gaps in the line of battle that can be easily filled, but that gap in the line of battle he held when he passed away no one can fill as completely and as truly as he did. No public man had a warmer place in the hearts of the people than he had. I have never seen a larger funeral than his. It was attended in large numbers by young and old, in all walks of life, from all parts of the State. They came in no perfunctory mood, but in a spirit of heaviness, grief, and sorrow, as though each had been bereaved of his dearest and most beloved of friends. There were many beautiful flowers placed as tokens of grief and affection over his remains, but the most impressive and most inspiring tokens were the silent tears that trickled on the cheeks of so many sad faces on that day. His mortal remains have been laid away in their final resting place, but the spirit of his life, his mission, and the great work he wrought will remain with us as a token, as an example, and as an inspiration for all time to come.

When can his glory fade?
Oh, the brave charge he made.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, there is no Senator who would not be glad to lay a wreath of honor and affection on the monument of CUSHMAN K. DAVIS. That, however, is more especially the right of his colleague and his successor and the members of the great committee where he won so much of his fame. I ought to say but a few words.

The Senate, as its name implies, has been from the beginning, with few exceptions, an assembly of old men. In the course of nature many of its members die in office. That has been true of thirty-eight Senators since I came to the Capitol. Others, a yet larger number, die soon after they leave office. Of the men with whom I have served in this Chamber fifty-eight more are now dead, making in all ninety-six, enough and to spare to organize another Senate elsewhere. To that number has been added every Vice-President but two. Upon those who have died in office eulogies have been pronounced in this Chamber and in the House. The speakers have obeyed the rule demanded by the decencies of funeral occasions—nil de mortuis nisi bonum—if not the command born of a tenderer pity for human frailty—jam parce sepulto. But in general, with scarcely an exception, the portraitures have been true and faithful. They prove that the people of the American States, speaking through their legislative assemblies, are not likely to select men to represent them in this august assembly who are lacking in high qualities either of intellect or of character. However that may be, it is surely true of Mr. DAVIS that whatever has been or will be said of him to-day, or was said of him when the news of his death first shocked the country, is just what would have been said when he was alive by any man who knew him. I have served with him here nearly fourteen years. I have agreed with him and I have differed from him in regard to matters of great pith and moment which deeply stirred the feelings of the people, as they did mine, and doubtless did his own. I never heard any man speak of him but with respect and kindness.

Of course, Mr. President, in this great century which is just over, when our Republic—this infant Hercules—has been growing from its cradle to its still youthful manhood, the greatest place for a live man has been that of a soldier in time of war and that of a statesman in time of peace. CUSHMAN K. DAVIS was both. He did a man's full duty in both. No man values more than I do the function of the man of letters. No man reveres more than I do the man of genius who in a loving and reverent way writes the history of a great people, or the poet from whose lyre comes the inspiration which induces heroic action in war and peace. But I do not admit that the title of the historian or that of the poet to the gratitude and affection of mankind is greater than that of the soldier who saves nations, or that of the statesman who creates or preserves them, or who makes them great. I have no patience when I read that famous speech of Gladstone, he and Tennyson being together on a journey, when he modestly puts Mr. Tennyson's title to the gratitude of mankind far above his own. Gladstone, then prime minister, declared that Tennyson would be remembered long after he was forgotten. That may be true. But whether a man be remembered or whether he be forgotten; whether his work be appreciated or no; whether his work be known or unknown at the time it is accomplished, is not the test of its greatness or its value to mankind. The man who keeps this moral being, or helps to keep this moral being we call a State in the paths of justice and righteousness and happiness, the direct effect of whose action is felt in the comfort and happiness and moral life of millions upon millions of human lives, who opens and constructs great highways of commerce, who makes schools and universities not only possible but plenty, who brings to pass great policies that allure men from misery, and poverty, and oppression, and serfdom in one world, to free, contented, happy, prosperous homes in another, is a great benefactor to mankind, whether his work be accomplished with sounding of trumpets, or stamping of feet, or clapping of hands, or the roar and tumult of popular applause, or whether it be done in the silence of some committee room, and no man know it but by its results.

I am not ready to admit that even Shakespeare worked on a higher plane, or was a greater power on earth, than King Alfred or George Washington, even if it be that he will survive them both in the memory of man. The name of every man but one who fought with Leonidas at Thermopylæ is forgotten. But is Æschylus greater than Leonidas, or Miltiades, or Themistocles? The literature of Athens preserves to immortality the fame of its great authors. But it was Solon, and Pericles, and Miltiades that created and saved and made great the city, without which the poets could not have existed. Mr. Tennyson himself came nearer the truth than his friend Mr. Gladstone when he said:

He
That, through the channels of the state,
Conveys the people's wish, is great;
His name is pure, his fame is free.

There have been soldiers whose courage saved the day in great decisive battles when the fate of nations hung in the scale, yet whose most enduring monument was the column of smoke which rose when their death shot was fired. There have been statesmen whose silent influence has decided the issue when the country was at the parting of the ways, of whose service history takes no heed. The great Ohio Territory, now six imperial States, was twice saved to freedom by the almost unnoticed action of a single man. With all respect for the man of letters, we are not yet quite ready to admit that the trumpeter is better than the soldier, or the painter greater than the lion.

There is no need of many words to sum up the life and character of CUSHMAN DAVIS. His life was in the daylight. Minnesota knew him. His country knew him and loved him. He was a good soldier in his youth, and a great Senator in his maturer manhood. What can be said more, or what can be said better, to sum up the life of an American citizen? He offered his life for his country when life was all before him, and his State and his country rewarded him with their highest honor. The great orator and philosopher of Rome declared in his youth, and repeated in his age, that death could not come prematurely to a man who had been consul. This man surely might be accounted ready to die. He had discharged honorably life's highest duty, and his cup of honor and of glory was full.

We are thinking to-day of something more than a public sorrow. We are mourning the loss of a close and delightful companionship, a companionship which lightened public care and gave infinite pleasure to private intercourse. If he had never held office, if his name had never been heard even beyond the boundaries of a single municipality, he would have been almost anywhere a favorite and foremost citizen. He was, in the first place, always a gentleman, and a true gentleman always gives tone to any company in which he is found, whether it be among the rulers of States or the humblest gathering of friendly neighbors. Lord Erskine said on a great occasion:

> It is impossible to define in terms the proper feelings of a gentleman; but their existence has supported this country for many ages, and she might perish if they were lost.

Certainly our friend had this quality. He was everywhere a gentleman. He met every occasion in life with a simple and quiet courtesy. There was not much of deference in it. There was no yielding or supplication or timidity in it. I do not think he ever asked favors, though no man was more willing to grant them. But there is something more than this in the temper of which I am speaking. The man who possesses it gives unconsciously to himself or to his associates tone to every circle, as I just said, in which he is found. So, wherever he was, his manner of behavior prevailed, whatever might have happened to the same men if they had been left alone.

Senator DAVIS was a man who kept well his own counsel. He was a man to whom it was safe for other men to trust their counsel. His conversation, to which it was always a delight to listen, had no gossip in it. Still less had it ever anything of ill nature or sarcasm. He liked to share with a friend the pleasure he took in finding some flower or gem of literature which, for long ages till he found it in some out-of-the-way nook, had—

> Blushed unseen,
> And wasted its sweetness on the desert air.

He had what Jeremy Taylor calls "the great endearment of prudent and temperate speech."

His conversation was sparkling and witty and full of variety, but no spark from him was ever a cinder in the eye of his friend.

He had a learning rare among public men, and, for its variety, rare, I think, among scholars. He would bring out bits of history, full of interest and instruction, from the most obscure sources, in common conversation. He was an excellent Latin scholar. He had read and mastered Tacitus, and a man who has mastered Tacitus has had the best gymnastic training of the intellect, both in vigor and style, which the resources of all literature can supply.

One secret of his great popularity with his companions here—a popularity I think unexcelled; indeed, I incline to think, unequaled by that of any other man with whom I have served—is that to which the late Justin Morrill owed so much. He never debated. He rarely answered other men's arguments, never with warmth or heat. But he was exceedingly tenacious of his own opinion. He was, in the things he stood for, as unyielding as flint and true as steel. But his flint or steel never struck out a spark by collision with any other. He spoke very rarely in debate, in general only when his official place on his committee, or something which concerned his own constituents especially, made speaking absolutely imperative. Then he gave his opinion as a judge gives it, or as a delegate to some great international council might be supposed to give it; responsible for it himself, but undertaking no responsibility for other men's opinion or conduct; never assuming that it was his duty or within his power to convert, or change, or instruct them, still less to chastise them. Whether that way be the best way for usefulness in a deliberative body, especially in a legislative body of a great popular government, I will not undertake now to say. Certainly it is not the common way here or elsewhere. It is very rare, indeed, that any man possessing the great literary and oratorical power of Mr. DAVIS, especially a man to whom nobody ever thought of imputing timidity or undue desire to enjoy public favor, or want of absolute confidence in his own opinions, will be found to refrain from employing these qualities to persuade or convince other men.

He had a wonderful judgment as to what the Senate would do. He was never afraid of his convictions or unwilling to make them known. But he did not like to butt his head against walls. He sought to find and to accomplish the best thing that the people would bear, and to accomplish their best aspiration and desire. He liked to put in his work at the turning point of a measure and not to waste his force either against the inevitable or in advocating that the success of which was already assured.

He had a rare and exquisite gift which, if he had been a man of letters and not a man engaged in a strenuous public life, would have brought him great fame. Once in a while he said something in private, and more rarely, though once or twice, in a public speech, which reminded you of the delicate touch of Hawthorne. His likening President Cleveland and Mr. Blount, looking upon the late royalty of the Sandwich Islands with so much seriousness, to Don Quixote and Sancho Panza taking in great earnest the spectacle of a theatrical representation at a country fair and eager to rescue the distressed damsel, was one of the most exquisite felicities of the literature of the Senate.

He had great pride in his ancestry, and was a great lover of the history of New England and Plymouth, from which they came, though he never gave himself airs on account of it. He was a descendant of Robert Cushman, the preacher of the Pilgrims, whose service was in a thousand ways of such value to the little colony at Plymouth. Yet it had never happened to him to visit the scenes with which the feet of his ancestors had been so familiar, until a few years ago he did me the honor to be my guest in Massachusetts, and spent a few days in visiting her historic places. He gazed upon Boston and Plymouth and Concord reverently as ever Moslem gazed upon Mecca or the feet of palmer stood by the holy sepulcher. That week to him was crowded with a delight with which few other hours in his life could compare. I had hoped that it might be my fortune and his that he might visit Massachusetts again, that her people might gather in her cities to do him honor, and might learn to know him better, and might listen to the sincere eloquence of his voice. But it was ordered otherwise.

There are other things his country had hoped for him. She had hoped a longer and higher service, perhaps the highest service of all. But the fatal and inexorable shaft has stricken him down in the full vigor of a yet strenuous manhood. The great transactions in which he had borne so large a part still remain incomplete and their event is still uncertain.

There is a painting which a great Italian master left unfinished. The work was taken up and completed by a disciple. The finished picture bears this inscription: "What Titian left unfinished, Palma reverently completed and dedicated to God." So may our beloved Republic find always, when one servant leaves his work unfinished, another who will take it up and dedicate it to the country and to God.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, if the purpose of these obsequies was only to eulogize the friend who so well deserved the esteem of his colleagues and so moved the Senate at all times with regard and affection for his generous and amiable traits, I would accomplish my part of this melancholy duty by repeating in your hearing the simple call of recognition, "The Senator from Minnesota," which never failed to attract the attention of the Senate or to give us pleasure.

If CUSHMAN K. DAVIS were here to-day to receive that recognition from the Chair, in this important time of serious counsel and debate, the Senate would feel stronger and safer in forming the new lines of public policy and duty upon which we must enter, so that we shall not fall short of the demands that have fallen upon us to try the strength of our courage, our fidelity to our country, and our confidence in the plan and principles of republican government.

His absence from the Senate is keenly felt at this time because the conditions for which we are now engaged in providing were, in a large part, created by measures in which he had a leading influence.

It is, perhaps, as just a tribute to his abilities and acquirements as could be stated to say of him that he was fully equipped for the questions that have arisen from the war with Spain, questions that are new to us and now excite anxious inquiry.

The Senator from Minnesota always remembered the dignity, honor, and restraining influence of that high official title.

It has a singular place of distinguished honor among the titles that have been bestowed by governments upon public servants who have been intrusted with powers of great magnitude.

The Roman senators, with all their power and glory, and the French senators for life, in the wide scope of their power and influence, have not been representatives of great sovereignties in a grand council of States, such as the Senate of the United States, which sits as a high court of final jurisdiction on all questions of impeachment, and is coordinate with the Chief Executive in the treaty-making power, and has a voice that can not be stifled in the enactment of all the laws for the government of this grand Union of equal States.

The history of the American Senate includes in its list of Senators who have passed away many illustrious names that are not darkened by comparison with any lawmakers who have ever lived.

But it is not the illustrious men who have occupied this great forum that have given to the Senate its real or entire value in the estimation of the world. That estimate is due to the character of the labors of the great body of Americans who have held commissions in this high council of sovereign States, which opened with the establishment of the Government of the United States and has continued in uninterrupted organization, without one moment of interregnum.

The Senate is the only permanent controlling body in the Government of the United States. There is always a quorum of qualified Senators in commission, and the transfer of the executive power from the hands of one President to another, and of the political power from one Congress to another, by elections, has no effect upon the Senate to suspend its powers under the Constitution, but only in some cases to suspend their full exercise, to await the concurrent action of other departments of the Government.

In this sense the Senate is the custodian of the vital and continuing power of the Federal Republic, while the States, as perfect civil governments, are the repositories of the sovereignty of the people.

In this great function the Senate is endowed by the Constitution with a power and majesty that no other tribunal has ever worn, and in comparison with which the mythical power derived from a strain of royal blood or the prerogatives of an imperial scepter are only a deceptive refuge of nations that have no faith in themselves. The Senator who appreciates the honor of a commission in this body, and is sensible of the duties it enjoins and of the wide opportunity it offers for bestowing blessings on his country and the world, will sedately reckon with himself upon the fitness of his conduct and the pure impartiality and justice of his utterances and his votes upon all occasions and with reference to all questions that arise. He will not set his personal success, or renown, as a star in the heaven of his ambitious aspirations, to which he will direct the course of his journey. He will be content to do the duty that falls to him faithfully, according to his ability, and leave the reward, that never fails, to the judgment of his colleagues and the approval of the people.

Of the many great and worthy men who have held commissions in the Senate only a few have reached the zenith of fame.

When we turn over the leaves of our statute books and examine the vast number of laws whose real authors are forgotten, and see the care and wisdom bestowed in their enactment and the history they record, and the strength, harmony, and justice of this wonderful system of statutory jurisprudence, we bow with reverence to the memory of these great but silent artificers of a true and noble temple of justice, in which wisdom, truth, and virtue preside. The stars differ in magnitude, but every star that is set in the firmament adds its ineffable light to the heavens, though no human hand can place them in their true position on a map.

Mr. DAVIS won a high place in the Senatorial galaxy, which is distinctly marked with the imperishable legend of "plain duty honestly performed with laborious care," and is crowned with the light of brilliant endowments.

He left nothing to chance and never omitted to dig the foundations of his structures to what he believed was the solid rock of truth. He was among the toilers of the Senate to whose industry in research the country owes a safe deliverance from many unseen dangers and an honest debt of gratitude. We are paying only a part of that debt in these obsequies. The people will pay the balance in ample rewards of fame.

A standard has been established by the growth of opinion in the Senate and the country, the advanced line of which is at least as high as any nation has established for the highest rank in statesmanship and forensic eloquence. Three great Senators have occupied that line without dissent, and others who have passed away are noted by our country for places on that line.

It is not expected that any will surpass Clay, Webster, and Calhoun, and it is not within the scope of the true Senatorial aspiration to reach sublimer heights than these immortals occupy, but their example stands as an invitation to all who fully value the honor, and dutifully toil to reach this supreme distinction to which they have attained.

This door is closed to any man whose motive is mere self-assertion, and who prefers notoriety to renown. The brilliant Senator, whose early death we deplore, may have had very high aspirations, for he had great abilities, but he sought his honors through toil, fidelity, and holy love of his native land.

Perhaps his strongest sentiment, with reference to his conduct as a Senator, was a dutiful regard for the dignity and reputation of this great tribunal. He sank himself in his character of Senator.

In his associations in the Senate and on committees his deference to the rights and opinions of his colleagues was sincere, courteous, and graceful. I do not recall an incident in all his career in which he was discourteous or brusque toward an opponent. Not that he avoided any stress of earnest contention in debate, nor that he yielded his convictions to the opposing views of anyone, however highly thought of as authority, but because he felt that the freedom of discussions, which he always approved, is an illusion when it is cramped by the weight of high authority and is sometimes destroyed by the use of epithets, censoriousness, irritating criticism, and grosser forms of detraction.

Mr. DAVIS never so far forgot the high office he held as to use his powers, which were ample, as a learned and able man, to force an opponent to the wall or to subject him to ridicule. When a Senator is thus assailed, if he is in the line of duty, the blow falls upon a sovereign State. Such a blow he would never wantonly inflict.

When he was placed at the head of the Committee on Foreign Relations he reached a field of opportunity in which his abilities would find their highest development in the service of the country.

He was a careful and deeply interested student of the history of our diplomatic relations with foreign countries. His tastes for eloquent literature and his legal acumen in the analysis of statutes and treaties, worded with the highest skill to cover or else to leave open debatable ground, led him into profound studies of the history and art of diplomacy.

He took a proud interest in the history of the single century of American diplomatic correspondence, and traced with enthusiasm the ground over which our infant Republic led the ancient empires of the earth as a pioneer in new lines of progress that led, without faltering, up to the highest planes of Christian civilization that have yet been occupied.

When he took that chairmanship he had unusual wealth of preparation for the discharge of its duties, and he soon made a record of such high value in his reports that the Senate relied upon his judgment and accepted his advice with unusual confidence. While he was chairman of that committee he was invited by the President of the United States, in company with two of his Senatorial colleagues and other distinguished persons, to negotiate a treaty of peace with Spain.

I will not attempt to present the history of that remarkable negotiation, in which the highest skill and learning were employed, and the most anxious and trying appeals to international forbearance and sensibility were addressed to our commissioners. It was not an effort to repress the wrath of contending nations, verging to the point of armed collision, but the demanding of justice for the stronger, at the close of an armistice that followed the most sudden and complete overthrow of sovereign power in lost possessions that had occurred in modern times.

The proud Empire that had held all Europe obedient to her pleasure and other continents and archipelagoes as feudatories was yielding her last possessions in the East and West Indies to a Republic that was younger by a century than any vice-royalty she had established in the Western Hemisphere. This advance from despotism to liberty was on the ground of her inability to do the justice to her dependencies that is required by the advance in human liberty now demanded by the code and creed of all Christendom, and the Unided States were constrained to lead it.

It was an occasion to move the sympathies of the European nations to their greatest depths, and they looked on with scrutinizing jealousy while the diplomatic contest continued at Paris.

In that noble body of American commissioners Mr. DAVIS was conspicuous for his learning, his tact, and his fearless advocacy of the right. It was a contest so notable that it will stand for a high precedent in later ages, and so satisfactory in the argument and the results that it has silenced criticism and has excited the admiration and invoked the good will of all the nations.

It was a task of self-denial that was never before presented to a conquering power—that we claim nothing for war indemnity, while paying for all the public property surrendered, and for all the devastations of a long civil war that Spain had inflicted upon our own people.

This task was assumed and this expenditure of more than $200,000,000 was made for no other reason—besides the preservation of our domestic peace—than to give the people of the Spanish islands the relief from despotism that can only be found in a government republican in form, one of whose cardinal principles is the divorce of church and state.

This great task was assumed by our commissioners in the treaty of Paris, and we are now engaged in working it out by the repression of a rebellious oligarchy among some of the people whom we undertook to redeem from the iron heel of the Spanish Empire.

Then, as now, the motive is the same, the high resolve is unchanged, and the decree is final, that the spirit of Republican constitutional liberty, which has driven out monarchy will also expel the curse of political brigandage and of sectarian and class rule from these islands, thereby providing that the people shall, indeed, be free and self-governing.

Doubtless this was the triumph that the noble American Senator had hoped to share with his colleagues in the accomplishment of this work that caused him to express, with tears, on his dying bed the pathetic words: "Oh, that I could live for three years to serve my country!"

He did not live, but "his works do follow him."

Two great and novel alternatives were presented to our commissioners in the negotiations at Paris as to Porto Rico and the Philippines, alike. They were whether we should annex those islands or whether we should abandon them to Spain.

The choice of annexation was inevitable, yet it was a great trial. Spain claimed the Philippines with the anxiety of a lion deprived of its prey, and we resisted that claim with the firmness that had already inscribed on our banners "Deliverance to the oppressed."

On that commission and afterwards in the Senate Mr. DAVIS and his Senatorial colleagues stood by this great purpose, and it became the supreme law of the land.

The fame that is thus interwoven with these events will grow brighter as time grows longer and nations grow greater and divine truth spreads its dominion over the nations now in darkness. That it taxes us with new duties that may be perilous is the just result and the honorable compensation, the true recompense of reward, for the wonderful increase of power that has been almost suddenly bestowed upon us.

"To whomsoever much is given, of him shall much be required," is as true of nations as it is of men.

The treaty of Paris places upon this Republic its first crucial test, its real trial of strength. In war we won our liberties from the proudest nation in the world. In war we settled a new basis of those liberties upon broader foundations. In war we have expanded our territories half around the world and have defended the freedom of religion in the heart of pagan China. In war we have prospered as no other nation has prospered, even in peace. Yet our mission is peace; our people love peace, and in all our wars we have only conquered peace for our own country and our own people, until the treaty of Paris made us the almoners of this blessing to other oppressed people. The real burden that this great trust imposes upon our Republic in the treaty of Paris is to provide peace and prosperity to the people that it incorporated with the people of the United States.

Mr. DAVIS assumed his share of this national duty with alacrity and without any misgivings as to the future. He felt the common impulse of the American people, that obedience to duty will not permit us to shrink from this noble task. It has required war, which vicious combinations may protract; but a war that ends in firmly established peace and secures constitutional liberty and the freedom of religion to the people realizes the highest duty of Christian benevolence. Rich argosies, ladened with the wealth of the earth and the oceans, will come and go between the East and the West, and the breath of peace will fill their ample sails.

The nations that were strangers and enemies will become neighbors, and friendship will unite them in fellowship as they exchange the bounties of all productive industry.

In their memories honored names will be familiar as the friends of humanity.

Among these none will be more beloved than our commissioners who concluded the treaty of Paris, and among these no name will be revered above that of CUSHMAN K. DAVIS.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, truly there is "a prince and a great man fallen this day in Israel."

When the news was flashed along the wires that CUSHMAN K. DAVIS had reached the end of his earthly labors and had entered into God's rest, we could hardly realize that our honored and beloved colleague had passed forever from our mortal fellowship. In the meridian of his life, in the full enjoyment of his wonderful mental faculties, at a time when his country so greatly needed his services, it seemed that "his sun had set while it was yet day." His passing seemed so premature that it was difficult for us to believe, as we had been taught, that "the judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether."

The life of CUSHMAN K. DAVIS, Mr. President, from young manhood to the end, is strongly interwoven with the history of his State and nation. Reared and educated in the new West, he early acquired that breadth of mind and honesty of purpose which are so often produced in a virgin country, and he escaped the narrowing influences and real provincialism that often are found in older communities and more densely settled sections. To his naturally elastic mind his earlier environments gave an ever broadening horizon. It was most natural that he should, in the time of his country's peril, offer himself as a defender of her integrity, for he had a sublime belief in the great American Republic; and this confidence in his nation and her future increased from year to year until his death. It is no wonder that in war he should have served her with gallantry and distinction. It was his nature, and he could not have done otherwise. From youth to death his highest ambition was for the honor, the integrity, and the glory of his country.

Mr. President, my first acquaintance with Senator DAVIS dates back but for a decade, but at the very threshold of our acquaintance I was struck, as all of us must have been, with his wonderful fund of information, political and general, his accuracy of mind and statement, his grasp upon great questions of state, and his unbending and unyielding Americanism. He was one of the gentlest and most unassuming of men, tolerant of the opinion of others and yet confident in his own judgment. Day by day compelled to meet and grapple with the difficult and knotty problems of the present, almost his sole recreation was in delving into the history, the philosophy, and the romance of the past. He was a master of ancient as well as of modern literature. To sit at his fireside, political life and legal problems being brushed for the time aside, and to hear from his lips the gathered treasures of his reading was of itself a liberal education; quiet and modest, assuming nothing to himself, I think it will be the opinion of all that no member of this body had a greater fund of general information than he. A student in the true sense of the term, nothing seemed to escape his observation and inquiry.

Of his career at the bar I shall say nothing, except to observe that none in all the great Northwest was more honored and successful than he. He loved his chosen profession, and she richly rewarded his devotion. From the trial court to that of last resort he deserved and received the highest respect, not only for his great legal attainments, but for his unswerving honesty of purpose as well, and this esteem and respect of bench and bar is a far higher reward to the true lawyer than money, emoluments, and fees, no matter how high they may be heaped. But it is of his work as Senator during the last three years I desire especially at this time to speak. During that time he has been chairman of the great Committee on Foreign Relations of this Senate, and he gave to the affairs and duties of that committee his unremitting attention and labors. It will never be told or known how closely his duties pressed upon him, but the country well knows and will always enjoy the fruits of his careful and continual labors. He was a Senator whose voice was too seldom heard in this Chamber, and yet he was a master of constitutional and international law. We who listened to his great speech in executive session on the war resolution of 1898 and the report accompanying it will never forget it, and a great regret ever since has been that, because of the peculiar rules and procedure of this body, such a clear exposition, both as to law and fact, of that great question with which this nation then had to deal should have been lost to the country.

As chairman of his committee his work was continuous, eager, and efficient. I do not think it too much to say that in all the deliberations of that committee during the past three years, in all the important and delicate questions arising, he was not only the chairman, but the guiding spirit. His intense Americanism, his patriotism, his belief in his country were always to the fore and seemed a propelling force, not only of that committee, but of this Senate, as well in the troublesome days from the beginning of the Spanish war until its close. His work as a member of the peace commission at Paris was a fitting close to his labors during the war. He and his distinguished colleagues taught the world a new diplomacy and proved its strength—the diplomacy unknown before that war, a diplomacy of honest, open, frank, and truthful statement; and the result of their labors placed our nation, in the eyes of the world, where she rightfully belonged—in the van of nations.

Mr. President, I regret that I am unable to do justice to the life and services of Senator DAVIS. What I have said has been because of my love for him and of my admiration and appreciation of his public services. England's cynic poet said, in speaking of eulogies and epitaphs:

> When all is done, upon the tomb is seen,
> Not what he was, but what he should have been.

Such is not the truth with respect to our tributes to our departed friend, because in his ardent love of country, his devotion to public duty, his services in this body, what he should have been, that he was. He quietly rests in his beautiful home city, the lamented son of his State and the Republic he loved. He gloried in his nation's past, and he looked forward with hope and confidence to her future. May his hope be justified, and may he rest in peace.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, "death," said one of the wisest of men, "hath this also: that it openeth the gate to good fame, and extinguisheth envy." Bacon, I conceive, meant more by envy than the mere jealousy of one man toward another. He intended, we may suppose, that general lack of just appreciation from which every man of distinction, especially in public service, often suffers in his lifetime. And he rightly says that death openeth the gate to good fame, which is but another way of declaring that it is the first attempt to do justice to a man's career and services. It is a common error that eulogies, especially those spoken in the freshness of grief, are necessarily as little to be believed as the epitaph held by Lord Byron to be typical of falsehood. This error springs from another equally common, that criticism means fault-finding, whereas true criticism, which alone is of value, consists quite as much in pointing out beauties as in enumerating defects. Therefore it follows that the eulogy fulfills the kindly function of criticism, the other having been already amply performed during the lifetime of him whose virtues are celebrated in a funeral oration. Thus the balance is made even, and in the two combined, History, looking down long hence with calm and patient eyes, will find the man and do him justice. If in the first burst of sorrow eulogy is overstrained, history can be trusted to set it right. At the worst, excess of praise is a good fault, for the chances are very great that the living man in his public life got less praise than he was entitled to and far more of misunderstanding than anyone deserves. Even if he did not endure in his public service the worst forms of calumny and detraction, he is certain to have suffered by comparisons made with a past which never existed, whose trailing clouds of glory are often conjured up by the envy of which Bacon speaks in order to make the living man of the moment look small and earthy. So it may be said that men act wisely to speak well of the newly dead, for thereby they do more than testify to their sorrow, inasmuch as they in some degree help to set the balance straight and thus give their mite toward the advancement of the final truth.

I have been moved to make these imperfect suggestions because as I have thought of Senator DAVIS, whose untimely death has brought so much sorrow to those who knew him, I have felt that he was a man who failed to receive in life a full appreciation. I do not mean by this that he was not amply honored, admired, and beloved by the great State which sent him here, or that he failed of understanding and appreciation in this Chamber, where his best work was done. Still less would I suggest that he did not receive, in due measure, the recognition which is witnessed by election to great public place, for I have known no one who held the office of Senator more highly than he, or who had a more exalted conception of the dignity and power of the Senate. Least of all do I mean that he suffered peculiarly from unfair criticism and ignoble aspersion of motive or conduct. On the contrary, I should think that he was exceptionally fortunate in these respects, and had it been otherwise, he was a man who knew that life was a battle, who did not fear blows, and who never complained or whimpered over the chances of war. When I say that he did not receive in his lifetime a just and full appreciation, in proportion to his ability and his achievement, I mean that he did not receive it from the country at large, and I say this because I know both the achievement and the ability and rate them very highly.

Others here and elsewhere will trace his career and tell of the offices he held and the honors he won far better than I could hope to do. Of his more intimate and personal qualities as a friend and an associate I shall not trust myself to speak. I desire only to explain why I think he was not fully appreciated as a public man and why I rate so highly his achievement. The first question is easily answered. Senator DAVIS lacked his due meed of appreciation in life for two reasons, one general and one particular. He suffered from the conventional tendency to belittle men of the present because they can not, without thought and trouble, be brought for judgment into proper perspective with the past and because there are many minds to which the belittling process is agreeable. He also suffered from a defect in himself. In an age when the art of advertisement of both men and wares has been carried to the highest pitch of noise and color he had neither the desire nor the faculty of advertising himself, either by lusty shouting or by stealthy suggestion. He was essentially modest, and shrank from even speaking in public except when it was a duty or a necessity.

A proper estimate of his ability and his achievement can not be so briefly given and supported as the explanation of their imperfect recognition. Indeed, it is not easy to analyze mind and character within the limits which this occasion requires. Yet, without an attempt, at least, in this direction I should fail entirely in what I most wish to say.

My friendship with Senator DAVIS began when I entered the Senate, nearly eight years ago. I soon came to know him well, and the knowledge bred affection, for he was a very lovable man, a loyal friend, a delightful companion, full of humor, sense, and originality. Our views on the public matters upon which we were engaged were usually in accord, and we had many other subjects upon which we sympathized, so that I came to pass many hours in his company and to talk with him about many topics.

I desire to speak of him now in the two aspects from which I learned to know best his unusual mental powers and one of which will give him place in the history of our time. I wish to speak of him as a statesman and man of letters—high titles, indeed, but he deserved them both.

First, then, as a man of letters. He was not a writer of books. A life given to war, to the law, and to politics left him no opportunity to enter upon a field where I am sure he might have won a distinction which he would have valued above all others. A lecture upon Hamlet, an address upon Madame Roland, a little volume upon the Law of Shakespeare, was all that he found time for in this direction. It is also true that he made no pretense to profound scholarship, to which, indeed, no man can lay claim unless he has devoted his life to its pursuit. Yet was he none the less a man of letters—was so by his wide reading, his cultivation, and his love of learning for its own sake. He had received a liberal education in the days when those words meant simply a classical education, and, what is far more uncommon, he had retained its teachings. I do not know whether he had kept up his Greek or not, but he never let go his Latin; and after leaving college he had taught himself French and Italian so that he read both with absolute ease and fluency—no small feat to be performed by a boy who went from the college to the camp and then fought his way up at the bar and in politics amid the sharp competition of a young and growing State. I remember a summer afternoon, when the Senate was engaged in one of those contests where physical persistence counted more than intelligence, passing by his desk and seeing there two books lying open face down with which he had been beguiling what, without impropriety, I may call the tedium of the occasion. I had the curiosity and took the liberty to look at the books in order to see what they were. One was an Italian work on international law; the other was Juvenal. As I put them down I wondered how many of the glib writers, or of the superior persons who in paragraph and speech utter the conventional sneer about the ignorance of American Senators and Congressmen, would wear away hot and weary hours by reading for instruction an Italian law book, and for pleasure the fierce and virile verses of the great Roman satirist. And be it remembered, it was all done for love and not for show, for I never knew a man of equal attainments who paraded them less. He was widely read in the literature of France and Italy, and still more widely in the ample and subtle speech which was his own heritage. He read thoroughly, and had a memory of iron grasp. Again and again I have been astonished at his sudden and apt quotations from writers little read and seldom quoted.

Like all men of broad cultivation, he had particular fields and special subjects in which he was peculiarly interested and upon which he was more deeply read than elsewhere. One of these was history, and more especially the period of the French Revolution—Napoleon and the Napoleonic wars. He had made a very complete collection of books relating to Napoleon, and everything he bought he read. On this subject he was an authority and an expert, not for any particular purpose, but because the man and the time fascinated him and from sheer love of historical research. He delighted, as all men of thought and imagination must delight, in the great pageant of human history, but in the sensual pleasure of the music and the banners and the glittering arms he never forgot to ask whither the columns were marching and what their movements meant.

His other specialty was Shakespeare. He studied and loved him, knew him through and through, and drew from him that intense delight which comes to all lovers of the greatest genius which has appeared among men. A little instance will show at once his knowledge and his devotion to the mighty poet. Senator DAVIS once defended a judge in an impeachment case. The point involved was the power of the court to punish for contempt, and DAVIS cited in support of his position the splendid lines in Henry IV, where the chief justice defends his action in punishing the Prince of Wales for contempt of the judicial office and authority. He said the quotation produced a great effect, as well it might. Senator DAVIS also wrote, as I have said, a little book, called the Law of Shakespeare, a very learned and interesting study, which never gained the notice and reputation it merited, because it was printed and bound like a law book, when it was really literary and historical.

But that which more than all else makes me speak of Senator DAVIS as a man of letters is that he loved literature for its own sake. A man may be well informed in many ways; he may have read many books and on his own subjects be learned, and yet he may have no literature, to borrow Dr. Johnson's phrase. Books are not necessarily literature any more than the application of paint and colors is necessarily the work of an artist. Painting a fence and painting the Sistine Chapel are both painting, but one is useful, everyday trade, and the other is a great art, the work of a towering genius. A census report is a book, and it is valuable, but it is not literature. In its highest expression literature is the greatest art of which the human race has shown itself capable. As Mr. Barrett Wendell so well puts it, "It is the lasting expression in words of the meaning of life." It must combine thought, wit, humor, fancy—all that can appeal to the heart, the senses, and the imagination—and it must go forth clothed in all the beauties which style and form can give it. It must exist for its own sake and be its own all-sufficient excuse for being. This was the literature which Senator DAVIS knew and rejoiced in and admired. This was what he read so widely in all languages, and especially in his own. This was what he loved purely for its own sake. And from this it follows that what he read most was poetry—that which is supreme in literature. In poetry he loved most what was greatest and best, and so he came to find what was good in all and judge aright the whole scale.

Despite the fact that he wrote little or nothing, I have dwelt upon him as a student and a man of letters for several reasons. His tastes and acquirements in this direction show the quality of his mind; such knowledge and love of literature are ennobling qualities worthy of remembrance, and such accomplishments in a distinguished public man are honorable to American public life. Senator DAVIS also illustrates the fact that although there are few, comparatively, who can rival him in extent of reading or breadth of cultivation, there are many, very many men in the public service who share his love of learning and of literature, in which they find the same pleasure and instruction that he found in the hours stolen from the engrossing cares of a life of action.

His generous learning and wide reading helped Senator DAVIS as a statesman, that other aspect of his life of which I wish to speak briefly. That he was a statesman in the best acceptance of that term can not be gainsaid. He dealt with large questions in a large way. He looked before and after, not to sigh for what is not, but that he might deal successfully with the present and prepare wisely for the future. Like most men learned in the law, his tendencies were conservative, but he did not shrink from innovation, nor was he the slave of precedent. The past, which he had studied so faithfully, was to him a wise teacher, not an unbending tyrant. He was not one of those who hide dislike of the present and distrust of the future under the guise of loyalty to the past. Although a man of strong will and masterful temper, he was ever open to new ideas. Above all, he had the two attributes essential to the highest statesmanship—sentiment and imagination. Without these gifts a man may be most successful, he may rise to the head of the state, he may do fine and enduring work, but he will never meet the greatest questions in the greatest way; and he may encounter a situation in which, despite his powers, he will fail solely from this deficiency in two qualities which are not practical, but which are none the less essential. Sir Robert Walpole was one of England's greatest ministers. He was the man for the time; he did the work England needed; his splendid good sense, his steady courage, his knowledge of men, and his executive capacity can not be overpraised. Yet Walpole could never have climbed to the heights which the elder Pitt scaled so easily, for he lacked the fervid sentiment and the soaring imagination of his great successor. These qualities of sentiment and imagination, combined with his learning, his long training at the bar, and his experience in public affairs, and supported as they were by an intellect which was singularly quick and resourceful, enabled Senator DAVIS to do his remarkable work of the last few years. When he came to the head of the Committee on Foreign Relations the country was just entering upon a new epoch; a period of change was beginning of which the end is still far distant. In the hurrying events which have crowded so fast upon us in the last four years Senator DAVIS played an important part. It is too soon to tell in detail or rightly to estimate what that part was in all the incidents which led to the Spanish war, in the making of peace, and in the solution of the problems which war and peace and our own strides toward economic supremacy have brought upon us.

In all that he did in shaping our policy he was helped by his knowledge and his studies, by much careful thought, and by an imagination which enabled him to project his vision into the future. But that which was his surest guide was a sentiment embodied in a profound patriotism and an intense Americanism. I do not mean that he was peculiarly American because he held certain opinions on certain public questions, or that he was more patriotic than others who differed with him radically upon those same questions. What I mean is that he had a faith in his people and their destiny which nothing could shake, and that he never had a shadow of doubt or distrust as to their entire ability to meet any responsibility and any question bravely, justly, and victoriously. He had proved his patriotism, like many other brave men, on the field of battle, and he hardly ever referred to it. But his love of country and everything connected with its history was with him a passion. He took a deep satisfaction in his direct descent from one of the Plymouth Pilgrims, and he was prouder of the name of Robert Cushman signed to the compact of the Mayflower than if it had been inscribed among those of William's knights on the walls of Battle Abbey. His thoughts were always upon the great questions now before the United States, and in the last hours his country and her fortunes were uppermost in his mind as the shadows closed about him. He was not a man who cried his own virtues and proclaimed his own deeds in the market place, but he did his work—great work, as the time demanded—strongly and well. He will find his place and his reward in the pages of history, when the story of these momentous years is told. That monument is for other hands than ours to build. We can only bear imperfect witness to what he was to us who knew him, and then leave his memory to—

> The silent melody of thought that sings
> A ceaseless requiem to the sainted dead.

Mr. DANIEL. It is a privilege which I appreciate, sad indeed, Mr. President, but all the more in consonance with the feelings which I bring to this mournful hour, to pay my respects to the memory of our dead friend and colleague, CUSHMAN KELLOGG DAVIS, of Minnesota.

He stood in the front rank of the lawyers and publicists of this country. He was an ornament of this body, as he was one of its most useful, able, and respected members. He was beloved here as he was beloved at home, and while the nation and the State alike deplore the loss of a noble and faithful public servant, those who had the privilege of association with him in his daily tasks mourn for him as a delightful companion and as a trusted friend whom they will know no more on earth forever.

The eminence which he had won was attained by the application of brilliant natural faculties to studious pursuits, and was the fitting reward of just and honorable labors. He was well equipped for public life. Before he came here he had been a legislator in his own State and had become its governor. He long practiced law in Minnesota, had achieved great success in his profession, and enjoyed a high reputation for learning, integrity, and sound judgment. As an advocate and as a counselor alike he had few equals. His mind was filled with technical lore, but, as well, with the large and equitable spirit of that jurisprudence which is gathered from the wisdom of the world and is applied in the affairs of men in all nations. There was no case of legal controversy, whether in the nisi prius or the appellate courts, or in an international tribunal, in which he would not have been the peer of any antagonist who could possibly have been arrayed against him.

He was a lover and a student of literature as well as of the law. His mind had been enriched and ripened by his familiarity with its masters, and he was the profounder and abler lawyer because of his accomplishments in letters.

The subjects to which he addressed his attention in his career as a Senator here he studied to their depths, and when he spoke upon them he was sure to develop them in their bearings with perspicuity, and to render a worthy and valuable contribution to their consideration. Erudite, analytical, logical, trenchant, always chivalrous, and often brilliant as he was, he never spoke without attracting deep, interested attention; and while he did not speak often, he always spoke with power, and frequently with rare and engaging eloquence.

As an adviser on public matters he was patient, painstaking, wise, prudent, and considerate. His character possessed the elements which befit the statesman. He looked upon all sides of a question and weighed the "pros" and "cons" with judicial discernment and discretion. While his mind worked quickly and with instinctive justice, he was too experienced and too wise to let loose mere impulsive apprehensions; and his conclusions on any subject were apt to be in consonance with the best possible, practicable attainment.

He was never extreme and never erratic; he was always courteous and always independent and manly. He had a high and honorable sense of conviction and of responsibility, with a certain reserve that modestly emphasized rather than diminished the dignity and weight of his opinions. The play of fine fancy sometimes fringed his serious discourses with phosphorescent fire, but never an unseemly word or misplaced levity marred or belittled his utterances.

A few years ago Mr. DAVIS delivered a short series of four lectures on international law before the faculty and students of the University of Minnesota. They are couched in that clear and sententious language which few could use so well; and they sum up the leading questions of international law which have arisen in our national history. No better brief of them could be produced, and I know of no source which contains so much apt learning for the American student so compactly stated.

His facility as an orator, his wisdom as a thinker, and his knowledge of affairs I once had agreeable opportunity to note at the Military Academy, Westpoint, when I had the honor to be associated with him as one of the Board of Visitors appointed by the President of the Senate. After we reached the Academy he was called on to make an address before the graduating class, with but few hours for preparation. To the "occasion sudden" he was fully equal. In that short time he wrote and delivered a polished and well-considered address which bore no mark of its hasty conning and which was filled with the worthy reflections and the fine spirit which well became such an occasion.

"Our gentle master," Shakespeare, had for him that magnetic attraction which has brought the world to his feet and which he will ever possess without a peer for all spirits "touched to fine issues." He calls him "the first of men;" and we may well say of Mr. DAVIS, as was said of Lord Chief Justice Campbell, that "he has the glory of placing a stone on the lofty cairn of our immortal bard," for he has written of him in a work which will lose nothing in comparison with that of the great English jurist and author on the same subject. Indeed, it is far more complete in illustration of the law in Shakespeare, and abounds in fine passages of historical and literary criticism.

It was written as the work of winter evenings and as an incident to the study of the works of him "who converted the elements which awaited his command into entertainments," and the members of that profession of which he was a shining light can not turn to its pages without feeling that he has made princely payment of the debt which, it has been said, every lawyer owes to his calling.

Those who have amused themselves in reading the curious books of the iconoclasts, which make laborious effort to show that Francis Bacon wrote the Shakespearian plays, as well as those who find in the master's work inherent evidence of his identity, will sympathize with Mr. DAVIS's sharp rebuke of their heresy where he says:

> And now comes some one and says that here is proof that Shakespeare is a mere alias for Francis Bacon. It is difficult to touch or let alone this vagary with any patience.
>
> One is inclined simply to protest in the words of Shakespeare's epitaph:
>
> "Good frend for Iesus sake forbeare
> To digg the dust encloased heare," > and pass on, deeming all secure against a desecration worse than that which the poet cursed.

Respecting his good taste in the fitting application of the fine thoughts of others, which, indeed, he seldom needed, so ready were his own, I may use his own language in reference to another and say:

> These emblems of his industry are woven into his style like the bees into the imperial purple of Napoleon's coronation robes.

How beautiful does he speak of the comparison between the first edition of Hamlet, in 1603, and the final revision of 1623, as showing how the hand of the master wrought upon his work.

"It is," said he, "as if some sculptor with an enchanter's power had wrought upon an unadorned Milan cathedral in one night, so that the morning showed thousands of carvings and statues where the day before were only walls of unadorned simplicity."

On the 2d of July, 1897, Mr. DAVIS delivered an address on the battlefield of Gettysburg, at the unveiling of the statue erected by the State of Minnesota in honor of the First Regiment of Minnesota Volunteers.

It was the thirty-fourth anniversary of that mighty conflict in which the regiment from the State which our friend represented had done a deed of splendid valor and paid the martyr's tribute, suffering more than any other command of either side in killed and wounded—more, indeed, than any command in any battle of the civil war. Two hundred and fifteen out of 262 fell in that awful cataclysm. Yet, as he said, "Only 47 were unhurt, but they stood in line, and not one man was missing." Not one of all the brave battalions of the North and South that threw themselves against the walls of fire on that dreadful day won greater honor than the First Regiment of Minnesota; and I may say of him who then spoke for them that their orator spoke as nobly as they fought, and like a knightly champion of a reunited people.

I wish, indeed, Mr. President, it were fitting for me to read all of that speech here. It is the rich, fragrant, mellow, sun-colored fruit of a tree deeply rooted in generous soil. It would better fill my brief time upon this floor than anything I could say. It was a message of peace and honor in the outstretched hand of true fraternity. It was the sage, the seer, the patriot, the honest man that spoke. No vainglorious outburst was there, and no condescension. But forbearance, toleration, moderation, self-restraint, patriotism—broad as the lines of the great Republic, warm as its firesides, vital in every part—honoring all men according to St. Paul's injunction.

May I be permitted, Mr President, to read a few passages from that noble utterance? Said he:

> Nearly 160,000 men fronted each other here. Neither waged a war of foreign invasion. They were brothers, deeply angered. But that brotherhood was an assurance of fraternal reunion at some time when war should cease and the resistless forces of reconciliation should assert themselves, as they have done, thanks be to Him who has guided and protected this nation.

Again, he said:

> Neither army was fighting for a monarchy, or to establish one. Each was pouring out its blood for its own constitutional government—for the right of man to govern himself in a republic. This fact is ever to be remembered in considering the philosophy of that great war. The irritating cause which produced it never for a moment seduced the men of either side from allegiance to the constitutional conception of their forefathers that governments exist only by the consent of the governed, and that this right can be most efficaciously established and preserved by an elective republic.

And yet, again:

> And it was this transcendental fealty which so soon reunited us in one family by the combined efforts of men in whom hostility had been appeased, and closed that awful chasm which our evil-wishers abroad predicted would always divide us by a fixed and impassable gulf. The same earthquake force which opened that abyss closed it again, and we stand now, here and everywhere, upon solid ground—holy ground here, because it is a tomb where the hosts of valor and patriotism have "set up their everlasting rest." It is also a field of resurrection whence has arisen the Genius of a restored Union.

He who thus spoke over the dust of his fallen comrades presents himself to my mind as the highest type of the American citizen; and as we contemplate him there on the heights, where angered brethren imbued the field in each other's blood, and hear the sweet small voice of love rise from a whisper to a bugle call in his utterances, we seem—> * * to see our flag unfurled,

> Our champion waiting in his place
> For the last battle of the world—
> The Armageddon of the race.

Mr. President, he, too, has passed to the tabernacles of everlasting rest, followed by honest tears, which flow as did his own noble speech from the purest fountain of our being—dews which rise upon the mountain top, descended from the heavens.

> Dead! While his voice was living yet
> In echoes round the pillared dome.
> Dead! While his blotted page lay wet
> With themes of state and love of home.

"When I die," said little Nell, "put something near me that loved the light and had the sky above it always." "Crown me with flowers," said Mirabeau in his last hour.

Innocent childhood, mature manhood, and the world-weary old man go alike as equals to the tomb, and yet with the same ever rising yearning spirit. Gaudy monuments there seem a sacrilege. Fulsome praise is repellant. The uppermost thought that comes to me as I say "farewell" to our dead friend is that throughout his service here, and in all his public life, he held all his countrymen in his heart, and spoke no word that leaves a thorn in any bosom. May I not lay this fact as a flower that bloomed forth from his own being upon his tomb? The virtue which he possessed and of which it is the token has had the sky above it always.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, painfully conscious that I can utter on this occasion no adequate tribute to the character and career of our departed colleague, I yet must speak here some earnest and tender words of my long-time friend. My memory of him carries me back to a time anterior to his removal from Wisconsin to Minnesota, when he was connected with the supreme court of Wisconsin, and availing himself of the great law library of that State in preparing for the practice of his chosen profession. I see him now as I saw him then, and I remember that he was considered one of the ablest, most brilliant, and promising young men in the State of Wisconsin. The judges of the court, all distinguished jurists, were especially fond of him, regarded him as singularly gifted and able, and confidently predicted for him a great career.

In 1870, when I removed to the northern border of Wisconsin, less than 20 miles from his home, he had already achieved eminence in the profession and was accounted one of the leaders of a brilliant and learned bar. He had first won distinction as a lawyer by the audacity, skill, and eloquence with which he had conducted the defense in a famous murder case, and, after the lapse of over thirty years, the ability and resourcefulness which upon that trial attracted the attention of Minnesota to his brilliancy and capacity is still a theme of conversation among the lawyers and laymen of that day.

As a lawyer he was remarkably well grounded in legal principles. He had not only studied the science of the law, but he had explored and mastered the history of the law. There are lawyers who know more of decisions and what is called "case law," but there are not many who have more thoroughly mastered the science of the law or are more familiar with its fundamental principles and the philosophy and reasons underlying them.

He possessed a rare faculty of generalization, and also of analysis, without the narrowness and tendency to technicality which sometimes characterize the analytical mind.

He was not as a lawyer in any sense a specialist, and I do not remember a man who had greater professional versatility. There seemed to be no branch of the law in which he was not at home. It is quite impossible to say that he was stronger in one phase of the practice than in another.

His arguments in the courts of last resort were luminous and weighty. In the examination and cross-examination of witnesses he was an artist, and in the argument of a cause to a jury he was powerful and persuasive. From the beginning of his career he was distinguished for a choice and abundant vocabulary, which was always subject to his command.

I have heard from him arguments addressed to the court upon questions of law and to juries upon questions of fact which I thought then, and think now, could not be excelled by anyone for strength, learning, and eloquence. There was a quality in his voice, a charm in his manner, and a beauty in his diction which was peculiar to him.

No man was ever more devoted to the interests intrusted to his care or more assiduous in the preparation necessary to the completest discharge of professional duty.

He seemed to have been born with a passion for reading. In the early years, when his professional duties and burdens were most exacting and pressing, I doubt if there was a night when his library was accessible in which he did not, laying aside all thought of law and courts and clients, seek and find recreation and refreshment in some volume of the classics, or of history, or in the pages of Shakespeare, or in the poems of the Bible. He could say with Gibbon:

> My early and invincible love of reading I * * * would not exchange for the treasure of India.

Never since I first knew him would he willingly exchange an hour with his books in the quiet of his library for any social function or assembly.

He read with great discrimination and with fine appreciation of the literary quality of the author and of his thought, however subtle. And he read to good purpose, for his capacious and retentive memory was an inexhaustible storehouse, in which there was no rubbish and from which at his will came jewels of rare beauty to enrich his speech at the bar, in the Senate, on the hustings, and in the daily intercourse with his fellows.

He had rare felicity in the use of language. Every word he used fitted in its place, and was chosen to give precise expression to the thought which he intended to convey. This seemed in him a gift. It characterized him in his early life, and I doubt if he ever uttered even a short speech in which there was not some sentence which challenged admiration for its perfection and fastened itself in the memory of the listener as a model. This was as true of his unpremeditated utterances as it was of those which were carefully prepared. While his style was classic and never commonplace, there was an utter absence of apparent word study.

While his well-earned fame at the bar for learning, ability, and eloquence was established, it was circumscribed, and the larger fame which he won and which will live in the history of the nation was achieved in the domain of statesmanship after he took his seat in this body. Few men ever came here with better natural endowment and preliminary training for the distinguished discharge of the high duties pertaining to this place than did he.

He never seemed to me in the Senate quite the man in physical strength and health he was when I had known him at the bar. His voice had lost something of the ringing and resonant quality which had impressed me in earlier years, and he seemed less aggressive and less inclined to contest and to speech. He came to prefer the study of great questions in the line of his inclination and special duty, and to speak only when it seemed absolutely necessary. He was a great constitutional lawyer, and he made of himself here a great international lawyer. I have not known one in public life who knew more accurately, in general and in detail, the great transactions of this Government, from the beginning, in its international relations. He was content, having expressed fully his views and the reasoning by which he reached his conclusions upon a measure of which he was in charge, or in support of a policy which he proposed, to leave it without further special advocacy to the arbitrament of the Senate.

He made some great speeches in this body worthy of any period in its history, which will stand for accuracy, wealth of learning, beauty of diction, and strength of argumentation as models. Some of the best speeches I ever heard him deliver were upon topics involving our foreign relations, which, though of remarkable beauty of expression, evidencing complete mastery of the subject, listened to by a full Senate with rapt attention, are lost to the world because in the public interest they were spoken in the secrecy of executive session. I recall several such which would have added to his fame, and which it is a pity were not preserved.

His was a daring mind. He had no time for inconsequential thought. Mentally "he walked the mountain ranges." No problem in the domain of international law or diplomacy was too complicated or monumental for his mental grasp. There was about him nothing of mental or moral timidity. He shrank from no responsibility; no specter or phantom danger had terror for him. Once convinced of the true course, he would guide the craft whose rudder was in his hands through any sea with unshaken nerves and will as firm as adamant.

His Americanism was intense, and his faith in the grandeur of our national future was absolute and implicit. He was not unmindful of perils, but he was undaunted by them. An idealist, he was also an eminently practical statesman. A lover of liberty and constitutional government, he realized that each is a development, and that "in the corrupted currents of this world" it can sometimes, alas, only be attained through training and struggle and sacrifice, and too often only through the shedding of blood.

Inexorable in maintaining the rights of his country and safeguarding its interests, he was scrupulous in insisting upon that courtesy and justice in the conduct of our foreign relations which are as essential to peace and good will between governments as they are among men. He knew that among nations, as among men, calmness and dignity of action best befit strength and power, and he was insistent upon the punctilious observance by his own Government in all cases of the etiquette usual in international intercourse, and in this more than once, in my judgment, he served the country better than its people know.

This man, sometimes imperious in his intercourse with equals, was always considerate, even tender, with the lowly and the humble.

He had unfaltering faith in the stability of this Government. It was based upon an unfaltering faith in the people.

He was a sincere friend of labor, but he insisted always upon the observance, by every class, of those laws and principles which are essential to the preservation of public security and good government.

I shall not forget, as the funeral cortège proceeded, on a bleak and wintry day, from the home which he loved to the grave in which he rests, how, as it passed the works of a great corporation, the men who toil there, quitting the furnace, the forge, and the bench, stood in line, with bowed, bared heads, with sorrow in each face, a touching tribute to the dead statesman who, they knew, had been in life their true and thoughtful friend.

He was loyal to the point of devotion in his friendships, and just and tolerant to every fair foe.

I noted in him many years ago, when brought for a time into contact with him in the city of his home, his love for children and their love for him. He answered a remark by me once upon the subject with this quotation:

> Better to be driven out from among men than to be disliked by children.

He was a politician, Mr. President, in the lofty sense, in the honorable sense, in that sense which is requisite to the best statesmanship. He despised political intrigue and backbiting.

He was a religious man in his convictions. I know from conversation with him long ago that he had had, as many of us have had, more or less of skepticism. It long ago disappeared, and I was not surprised, but confirmed, in my understanding of his attitude by reading recently this utterance of his upon the subject to Rev. Dr. Samuel G. Smith, of St. Paul, his friend:

> It is a great deal better to have these things discussed by the friends of the church rather than by her enemies, but it is not new—Voltaire had much to say on the subject. The heart of the question is not in any debate about the history of the books of the Bible. I am very familiar with the Bible. Job is the noblest poem ever written, and there is much of the loftiest eloquence in the Prophets. Nor is it in the literature of the Bible that the problem of faith rests. I know human history, and I know that in the first century something happened that destroyed the old world and gave birth to the new. The resurrection of Jesus would account for that change, and I do not know of any other adequate solution that has ever been proposed.

I read this as evidence of his faith, and as an example of that generalization, broad and strong, which was characteristic of him.

He loved the duties of the Senate, and he delighted in the companionship of the Senate. After he was stricken with the illness from which he died, and a few days before the election, I called upon him. He had suffered intensely, and his nerves were shaken. As I bade him good-bye I sought to cheer him, and prophesied his certain presence at the opening of the session of the Senate. In a low voice he said to me, "It is a great body, a great body; good-bye." To me these were his last words.

It is said that in the delirium which preceded his release from pain and his entering into rest he constantly talked of the Senate and of the great affairs here, which were, in a measure, committed to his charge, and expressed a wish to live a few years longer, that he might help to work out some of the half-solved problems which press upon us, and to which he had given anxious and laborious thought. It was not to be.

We have missed him; we will miss him; and those of us who served with him here will remember him with admiration for his learning and his genius, and with affection for his kindliness and the charm of his comradeship. Truly, Mr. President, he was a man of "great and shining parts"—student, soldier, lawyer, orator, scholar, statesman—in each of these excelling.

Happily, Mr. President, no man is indispensable to any State or country. Minnesota, who loved and honored him and who was by him loved and honored in return, will be represented in this Chamber by strong, able, patriotic, and eloquent men; but, depreciating no one, it will not be strange if she shall not be able, taking him all in all, to send here another CUSHMAN K. DAVIS.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, Senator DAVIS belonged to the Northwest, though claimed by the State which honored itself in honoring him. We of the Northwest looked to him as a leader devoted to its interests and fully comprehending and sympathizing with its wants. In a larger sense he belonged to the nation as one of the nation's distinguished servants.

Yet he was distinctively a product of the newer portion of our realm, emerging from childhood, through the intervening years of youth, into the maturity of manhood surrounded by those progressive people who subdued a wilderness and impressed the vigor of their constructive capabilities upon expanding minds.

Born in Henderson, in the State of New York, on the 16th of June, 1838, Mr. DAVIS was taken by his parents from his native State to the Territory of Wisconsin when but a few months old, and there his family enrolled themselves among the pioneers who created a State that has already furnished the country with many noble examples of patriotic ability.

During that period in life when the mind receives its lasting impressions Mr. DAVIS imbibed the rudiments of that knowledge which in its fullness made him a masterful leader among men. His adopted State was at that time the abode of an unusual proportion of rising representatives of statecraft, endowed with conspicuous mental capacity. Growing to manhood in the midst of influences thrown off from the discussions of men of strong intellectuality, during the formative years of a new Commonwealth, Mr. DAVIS's receptive mentality absorbed the teachings of the conspicuous men of the times, and these furnished the foundation for that broader knowledge, acquired through a habit of industrious research, which formed, in the maturity of his years, the eminent scholar and profound statesman to whose memory we are to-day bestowing the affectionate tribute of sincere words.

Senator DAVIS's education was begun in the common schools of the young State of Wisconsin, and from these he passed to a local college in Waukesha, his home town. From this college he entered the University of Michigan, graduating therefrom in 1857.

Fresh from the honors of university life, he became a student in the law office of Alexander Randall, afterwards governor of the State. A few years of studious application to legal research fitted Mr. DAVIS for the profession of a lawyer, and he opened an office and entered upon the career that made him conspicuous among the leading men of the nation.

When the storm of the civil war broke upon the country Mr. DAVIS abandoned the avocations of peace and became one of that vast army which the North sent forth to grapple in titanic struggle with their brethren of the South. Broken in health, he was compelled to abandon military life in 1864, retiring from the Army as a lieutenant in the Twenty-eighth Wisconsin Infantry.

After abandoning the profession of arms Mr. DAVIS resumed the practice of law at St. Paul, Minn., which city remained his home up to the time of his lamented death. In the succeeding years he filled many public positions of responsibility, being a State legislator, United States district attorney, governor of his State; and finally his constituency elevated him to a seat in this body, and twice affirmed their confidence in his representative ability. During thirteen important years in our history Senator DAVIS honored this Chamber with his presence, and so strongly had he endeared himself to his associates that when he was summoned hence to enter another life he left within the scene of his national successes a profound sense of irreparable loss.

During the sixty-two years which marked the span of his useful career the gravest national questions have arisen and the most serious perils have beset the life of the Republic. Since reaching man's estate Mr. DAVIS has been an active factor in the solution of these public problems, either upon the field of war's strife or in the peaceful councils of the people. Death found him in the midst of the crowning achievements of his public life, and that he was loath to go and leave his work unfinished is attested by those who ministered to his sufferings and watched in sorrow while the soul separated itself from the tenement we have loved and honored as the personification of rare mental gifts and true worth in man.

I am a mourner at the shrine of a friendship that has existed during many years and reaches beyond the barrier of death. Having known Mr. DAVIS intimately in the public and private walks of life—in the forum, in the home and social circle, and in the seclusion of confidential intimacy, I bear testimony to the greatness of his mind and the goodness of his heart, to his unswerving integrity, to his fidelity to principle, to the presence of mental endowments that elevated him to a conspicuous position among the statesmen and philosophers of our advanced era. Sincerely do I hope that the example of his public and private life may remain among and with us as we bear the burdens of earthly pilgrimage and sanctify the hour when we stand again in the presence of the departed.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, while those qualities which make the soldier or the patriot, the scholar or the statesman, instinctively command our admiration and honor, they are not always the ones which most deeply impress or enshrine a noble character in the affections of his associates or engender the deepest reverence and esteem.

These great qualities of soul and brain manifested in the life of CUSHMAN KELLOGG DAVIS were happily combined with the gentle and tender impulses of a sympathetic heart to an extent seldom equaled in any one individual—the elements of a sage counselor and a generous friend.

While I have watched with pride and honor the public career of this star of my native State whose lustrous character shone over all this great nation, my close personal acquaintance has been limited to a few years only. That short period, however, has been sufficient to know the man, for the character of every individual is like a divinely builded palace, whose majestic proportions and harmonious form, reflecting the beauty and sublimity of the soul of the architect, may be comprehended in a single glance; or like the finished work of some grand artist, which, while it reflects upon the canvas lofty ideals which speak like angels of sympathy to the souls of men, yet shows the labored touch of every stroke of the magic brush.

So was the real life of Senator DAVIS known to all who had the honor of his acquaintance, the privilege of his personal friendship, the more delicate details ever traceable in the grander structure of the whole.

Though firm and strong, his firmness was so blended with gentleness that, while his whole character stood out grand and imposing, it was softened like some great mountain peak half veiled in morning mists.

His generosity was not of the latent quality which required an exciting stimulus to develop its activity, but was ever alert and active, and responded as naturally and as surely as the magnet to the pole. In his kindness and gentleness you felt the glow and fire of sincerity, which inspired absolute confidence.

With a patriotism unbounded, his youthful vigor and manhood's prime, the best of his life and thought, were dedicated to his country's good. That same devotion to nation manifested in his enlistment and service through the civil war was characteristic of his whole life.

The associates of Senator DAVIS in the last session of Congress know how unremittingly were his labors in the very face of the enemy of life. The advent of an insidious disease, to which his physical health was rapidly yielding and which was soon to claim him for its own, seemed rather to intensify than diminish his zeal. One thought with him was supreme—his country needed his service.

The words of the poet might well have been dedicated to him:

> Oh, think how to his latest day,
> When death just hovering claimed his prey,
> With Palinure's unaltered mood,
> Firm at his dangerous post he stood.
> Each call for needful rest repelled,
> With dying hand the rudder held.

But his love of country was not a blind devotion. He admired the true, generous, and brave in all countries, and held his own as rigidly to his ideal of national honor and duty as he did the highest or lowest nation of the world.

His great success in the field of politics was not the result of that tact, skill, and diplomacy, by so many understood to be an essential to successful political advancement.

His tact was the ardor of his convictions of right and unswerving loyalty to those convictions; his diplomacy the directness and simplicity of his utterances; his skill was his scholarly attainments and thorough knowledge of all the great political questions of the day.

As a jurist he ever interpreted law by the standard of justice—the soul which should permeate every human code—and never deflected that standard except toward the side of mercy. His arguments, like his character, were seldom aggressive, but ever clear and persuasive.

As a young man he gave his youthful vigor and strength of manhood in war that no star should be lost to the firmament of American nationality. In his later years he gave that counsel to his country which broadened its national horizon and raised it to a higher, broader, and nobler position among the powers of the world.

The tribute of Sir Walter Scott to Fox, in his last resting place, most fittingly portrays the noble nature of CUSHMAN KELLOGG DAVIS and his country's loss in this era of great national changes:

> For talents mourn, untimely lost,
> When best employed, and wanted most;
> Mourn genius high, and lore profound,
> And wit that loved to play, not wound;
> And all the reasoning powers divine,
> To penetrate, resolve, combine;
> And feelings keen, and fancy's glow—
> They sleep with him who sleeps below.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. President, Senator DAVIS was my near neighbor for twenty-five years, and, while it is impossible for me to add to the eloquent and just tributes already spoken in his memory, I feel constrained to contribute a few neighborly remarks bearing witness to his many sterling attributes of mind and heart.

Over a quarter of a century ago, when I first met him, he was a rising and ambitious young lawyer, who was attracting friends as well as attention. That he was a confiding and tenacious friend those who know him best gladly testify; but of all his notable qualities his strict integrity first challenged my admiration.

His briefs were perfect, and his thoroughness as a lawyer was, in my humble opinion, the substantial foundation of his success at the bar. His intellect was ever clear and vigorous. He had the power to grasp great intellectual problems, and his prophetic solution of delicate and grave international questions in his riper years stirred the pride of his former neighbors, who predicted a brilliant career for him when he was yet burning the midnight lamp during and before his achievements as United States district attorney of Minnesota—nearly thirty years ago.

And yet Senator DAVIS did not reach the pinnacle of his power by sudden flights, but rather by steady, persistent plodding and continued application. Day by day, year by year, his abilities and knowledge increased until he developed into a great lawyer—a foremost statesman. He was a notable advocate of the rights of good citizenship and early gained and held the confidence of a large circle of friends. This priceless confidence of his friends continued to the end, consoling him on his bed of sickness and spreading flowers on his tomb.

While this worthy son of a great Commonwealth was a profound scholar, he was a most affable and genial companion and neighbor. In his infrequent moments of leisure his genial spirit and generous hospitality warmed the hearts of his friends and had the pleasing effect of placing the most humble and timid on a level of most charming equality. His friendships were so strong that the severest tests and rudest shocks could not break them. Only the settled conviction that a flagrantly unworthy act had been committed caused him to withdraw the abiding confidence reposed by him in his friends.

His library was stored with choice volumes, and the young men who have had the opportunity of enjoying and profiting by his varied knowledge of men and affairs may well count themselves fortunate. Those partaking of the feast of reason spread by him for his friends will ever remember his remarkable familiarity with the thoughts and writings of men of profound learning of all ages—as well as his interesting conceptions of the teachings of nature. At one time, during an interesting discussion, he would make use of a plain illustration of the common people, next a simile evolved from his own extended experience, and then a classical surprise, pertinent and ever pleasing. His reasoning was clear and concise, his position absolute and definite. Gradually interest in his literary attainments and legal ability spread beyond the middle West and throughout the country in general, until he was known everywhere for his bright intellect, his patriotism, and conscientious performance of public duty.

He was considerate of every man's opinion, and, as a friend and lawyer, this made him an agreeable associate. He was tenacious and unyielding, after reaching conclusions, and in many notable instances time has demonstrated the correctness of his opinions and the soundness of his mature judgment. With Senator DAVIS convictions were sacred, and that he had the courage of his convictions his public acts and deeds amply testify. In expressing his convictions he was fearless, forcible, and courageous.

The fidelity with which Senator DAVIS discharged his public duties is the subject of frequent and earnest commendation among his admirers, but as a former neighbor I deem it an honor to bear witness to his attention to small things. In the little courtesies of life he was thoughtful and considerate. He displayed a disposition to help and perform those slight acts of kindness that cement and firmly hold our friendships. When news reached him, for instance, of an old friend living in a far distant part of the country having been chosen to a seat in this Chamber, he found time, although burdened with grave responsibilities of far-reaching importance, to write full particulars touching upon the duties of a newly elected Senator.

His career has been ended abruptly, at a time when his splendid talents were most keenly appreciated and could least be spared. That his death should occur at this particular time is, indeed, peculiarly sad.

As an eminent authority on constitutional and international law and diplomacy, his services to his country were of inestimable value during the uncertain and eventful days before and during the late war with Spain, and as these last services to his country are yet fresh in the minds of a grateful people, the generous appreciation now manifested adds to the crowning patriotic achievements of his public life.

Mr. TOWNE. Mr. President, the language of eulogy has many times awakened the echoes of these august walls. Often in this place have affection, gratitude, and admiration paid their unstinted tribute to great talents, exalted character, valiant deeds, and useful service. Here whatever is high in purpose or excellent in performance has again and again been celebrated by all that is noble in thought and eloquent in speech.

To-day, with whatsoever humbleness a voice may raise itself to mingle with these mighty memories, there is that in the subject of this observance which vindicates propriety by transforming presumption into duty. His countrymen at large had hardly reached a just appreciation of the native genius and the vast and varied acquirements of CUSHMAN KELLOGG DAVIS when envious death obscured the light whose radiance had but begun to shine in its peculiar sphere and with its own original luster. The people of his Commonwealth, among whom he lived his simple, unostentatious, busy life in a familiar association of more than thirty years, had come to know him well.

His name is a household word throughout the State of Minnesota. His varied endowments, his wide and accurate scholarship, his versatile capacity, were common knowledge, and when he was called, as his fellow-citizens knew he some time must be, to a large opportunity upon the theater of the national history they looked confidently forward to a career that should leave all his countrymen as well assured as they themselves already were of his right to a place in the pantheon of American greatness.

In everyday life Mr. DAVIS was democratic and unconventional, genial and approachable, though never without that unobtrusive suggestion of dignity which almost seems to be the peculiar property of the true American gentleman. His simplicity was as unaffected as his self-respect was unmistakable. He had withal a lively sense of humor which, playing above an illimitable expanse of miscellaneous information, lighted up his conversation like sunshine upon a diversified landscape.

At the bar he early attained to eminence. Always a student in whatever interested him, he had an extensive acquaintance with the literature of jurisprudence, although the structure of his mind inclined him toward the exposition of principles rather than the mere aggregation of cases. His arguments to courts were models of legal reasoning and logical method; while in addresses to juries his intimate knowledge of human nature, his faculty of illustration, and his felicity of speech made him an opponent to be dreaded. As a trial lawyer he excelled in the arrangement of the order of his proofs, in his command of the rules of evidence, and in the art of examining witnesses, exhibiting with other merits in this last department that rare discretion which knows how to resist allurements toward excessive cross-examination.

Senator DAVIS was a conspicuous example of the scholar in politics. His reading, both in history and in general literature, was comprehensive and minute; but in this respect, as in others, he followed the instinct of his own taste and preference rather than any hard and fast programme of study. His library was his most congenial habitat. Thither with unerring certainty he might be traced in the intervals of professional engagements or public business. His books had gathered about him in answer to the call of his mind for companionship and counsel. He bought no volumes by job lot to fill shelf room and make a brave appearance. He knew each one of them like a friend. He handled them lovingly. He felt at home among them. Could they be marshaled in the order in which they came to him, their character and sequence would be at once an index to his many-sided capacities and a history of his growth.

His early love for the classics abided with him from his college days to the last. Ovid, and Livy, and Horace, and Virgil were customary relaxations; and I recall an occasion when, in selecting the contents of his valise for a journey, even a box of his favorite brand of cigars was compelled to give place to a copy of Sallust and a volume of Pliny's Letters. On his return from Paris two years ago he brought with him, as a trophy prized scarcely less than the famous treaty itself, a French edition of the entire extant Latin literature. Many Senators will, no doubt, remember his remarkably happy and ready rendering of a passage in one of Juvenal's satires which he made impromptu during the Hawaiian debate in the Fifty-third Congress. Having quoted as follows:

> Sed quo cecidit sub crimine; quisnam
> Delator? quibus judiciis; quo teste probavit?
> Nil horum; verbosa et grandis epistola venit
> A Capreis. Bene habet; nul plus interrogo.

He thus proceeded:

> My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] requests me to translate that. He does not need it, of course. But another Senator [Mr. Washburn] suggests that some of the rest of us do. I will not attempt to give a literal translation, but I will give an accurate paraphrase, which will show its application: "Into what crime has he fallen? By what informer has he been accused? What judge has passed upon him? What witness has testified against him? Not one or any of these. A verbose and turgid message has come over from Capri. That settles it. I will interrogate no further."

Those who have not forgotten the circumstances under which this speech was made will understand that this passage is a good witness to much more than a familiarity with a Latin classic.

With all his various and wide excursions in the domain of general literature, there were some spots he specially loved to visit, a few nooks he made almost his own. A boyhood enthusiasm for Napoleon stimulated an interest in that wonderful man and all that concerned him, and led to the collection of many rare portraits of the great Corsican and of several hundred volumes dealing with his life and times.

It is probable that no other private library in this country can show so large a Napoleonic bibliography as that left by Senator DAVIS; and I question whether any living American other than Professor Sloane has at his instant command such a rich fund of accurate information concerning the first Emperor of the French as that which so often charmed and astonished the friends who were fortunate enough to be in the Senator's company when this absorbing topic was introduced and his mood was fertile.

It is doubtful whether Mr. DAVIS found in any other author quite so keen a delight as in Shakespeare. Himself gifted with a vivid, yet sane imagination, exquisitely sensitive to the music and rhythm of perfect verse, prone to comprehensive generalization, and profoundly studious of the psychology of human character, the atmosphere of the incomparable poet-dramatist was most congenial to him. In his early manhood the study of Shakespeare was, as he has told us in a published essay, habitual. This study was not only con amore, it was critical, comparative, and exhaustive. Its results in one department of criticism he made known in a volume called The Law in Shakespeare, which remains, I believe, the best and most thorough exposition of this branch of Shakespearean learning. One passage from the "introduction" of this volume I will quote as an example of Senator DAVIS's literary style and of his method of thought:

> There was everything in that romantic age to stir the imagination. There was a spirit of chivalry abroad which marched in quest of something more substantial than moldy relics, and fulfilled vows sworn to something grander than the achievement of pious absurdities. Frobisher had sailed northward into the silence of the eternal seas of ice. El Dorado lifted against the western skies its shafts and domes of gold. The Armada had vanished like a portentous phantom, smitten by the valor of Englishmen, and chased far off into the Hebridean fogs by the waves of the exasperated sea, which fought for its island nursling. Hawkins, pirate and admiral, had thrown his fortune into the pit which threatened to swallow up his country, and had died under the displeasure of his stingy yet magnificent queen. Raleigh, having seen his dreams of the New World die out, lay in the Tower writing his history, doubtless smoking the consoling weed while awaiting the end of so much bravery, so much rashness, and so many cares, in the summons of "eloquent, just, and mighty Death."
> Drake had spoiled the seas and the cities thereof. Capt. John Smith had told of great empires in the West and their swarthy emperors. Mary, Queen of Scots, that changeful enchantress, as we see her now—at one time the French lily, all sweet, and pure, and fragrant, and again the Scottish thistle, spinous and cruel to all who touched her—had woven the cords of love into the chains of empire, and had pressed the cup of her sorceries to the lips of many men, until her own glorious head bowed to "the long divorce of steel."

Little argument is needed to show that the author of this paragraph might have entered upon almost any department of literature, whether creative, critical, or historical, with absolute assurance of distinction.

Senator DAVIS's facility in modern languages was very unusual for an American public man. He had for literary purposes a practical mastery of French, a knowledge of Italian only slightly less, and a very serviceable use of Spanish. One of the most valued sets of books in his collection was a complete and uniform edition of the Italian poets, through which in leisure hours he wandered, ever with senses alive to each peculiar beauty, from Dante and Petrarch to Leopardi. Contrary to the general impression, even among his friends, he knew and read the German language; but his admiration for its literature was confined to its poetry, chiefly the folk-songs, Heine, and the lyrics of Schiller.

One of the favorite subjects of his youthful investigation was destined to afford Mr. DAVIS his chief avenue of distinction in public life. I think it probably true that no contemporary statesman excelled him in acquaintance with the literature of international law, or in the ability to state its principles and to argue their application. All the elementary works on the subject in English, French, and Italian were familiar to him, and he was profoundly versed in diplomatic precedents and history. His conceded preeminence as an international lawyer in this body, where several of his colleagues were justly ranked high in the same branch of learning, is the strongest certificate to his abilities and attainments. These qualifications were recognized early in his Senatorial service, and it is well known that many successive Secretaries of State availed themselves of his great store of knowledge, always courteously at their command.

He himself has told me of one occasion whereon Secretary Blaine, by producing at a Cabinet meeting the particulars of a certain diplomatic precedent upon which Mr. DAVIS had happened while reading a French authority, was able at a critical moment to secure the adoption of a procedure that, in all probability, avoided the extremity of war with a South American State. The reports which, as member and as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, he has submitted to the Senate during the last ten years form a very valuable literature on many important topics in international law.

Only those in the very highest places of responsibility can testify how intimate and constant a reliance had been placed on Senator DAVIS from the first mutterings premonitory of the Spanish-American war down to almost the very day of his death. Credible report has attributed to him the greater part of that masterly polemic in diplomacy whereby our peace commissioners at Paris, in a long series of interchanged notes with some of the ablest and astutest international lawyers in Europe, achieved a result which, even by those of us who do not approve the policy, must be admitted to constitute a signal triumph of dialectic skill.

Death found CUSHMAN K. DAVIS at the zenith of his powers and at the summit of his opportunities. He stood at the head of the committee which at the present critical juncture in our history is the most prominent committee of the highest governmental body in the world. If the policy on which his party has entered is to be pursued, the unexpired portion of his current term, comprising the next four years, must be all important in the shaping and adjustment of that policy as related to numerous and complicated international interests. This was a situation calculated to appeal to his highest ambition, to stimulate his greatest potencies, to spread before his mental vision the most satisfying prospect of worthy and enduring fame.

Yet here, on the threshold of the consummation of his career, at the very entrance to that fair field for whose delights and glories all his past seemed to have been a designed preparation, inscrutable fate had ordained that he should pause. No one realized the tragic pathos of the catastrophe more fully than did he; yet he bore the sorrow of it with a moral heroism equal to the physical courage which he opposed to the stoutest assaults of pain. He might wince, but he would not cry out; he could express regret, but he did not complain. And when his feet touched the waters of the river beyond which lies "that undiscovered country," the glance that sought inquiringly the farther shore was a glance that felt no shade of fear.

As a young man he had for a time yielded to the influence of that irreligious skepticism which was often the too hasty refuge of minds strongly impressed by the wonderful development of the physical sciences shortly after the middle of the nineteenth century. But as he grew older, and as his reading broadened and his habit of introspection strengthened, the thought that all the preparation of the centuries is purposeless and that the end of innumerable universes is mere nothingness gave no comfort to his soul and found no justification in his reason.

Familiar with the ancient philosophies and with the general principles of recent science, he found in both of them that which, while it yielded no exclusive basis for a particular creed, yet gave ample support to the sweet assurances of the Christian religion respecting the future life. The Grecian thinkers had reached conclusions summarized in the well-known lines of Addison's Cato:

> It must be so.—Plato, thou reasonest well!
> Else whence this pleasing hope, this fond desire,
> This longing after immortality?
> Or whence this secret dread and inward horror
> Of falling into naught? Why shrinks the soul
> Back on herself, and startles at destruction?
> 'Tis the divinity that stirs within us;
> 'Tis Heaven itself that points out an hereafter,
> And intimates eternity to man.

Modern cosmogony, in sweeping away the ancient fond delusion that the sun, the moon, and the unnumbered stars, "still quiring to the young-eyed cherubims," circle obediently about the earth, the central home of specially created man, merely to give him light and to serve as pleasing objects of his æsthetic contemplation, has substituted a doctrine infinitely more flattering to his consequence and in itself strongly probative of his immortality. It shows the human drama to have begun in the primordial chaos among the whirling atoms of diffused universes, the raw material of unborn worlds.

By the operation of forces of which the finite mind can not begin to grasp either the subtlety or the power, through reaches of time for which even the strongest symbols of our speech are weak as aids to the faltering imagination, the laws of the Eternal Beneficence evolved the order of celestial systems and the mysterious phenomena of life. At the culmination of the long ascent of being stands man, the consummate product of a creative process that began before "the morning stars sang together." Every resource and agency of nature is tributary to him—first, to develop the body, next to nurture the mind, and finally to culture the soul and fortify it for its career through the yet unsounded spaces of spiritual progress.

In his primitive condition man's whole anxiety was to procure the means of mere physical existence and security. By and by the chief concern of this very existence and security came to be the higher things of the mind. Now we are beginning dimly to realize that the spiritual life is the highest of all, the goal toward which the vital principle has been climbing through all the æons gone. There is not an analogy in nature that does not justify the belief that the perfection of this spiritual life is the very flower and purpose of creation. This fact crowns existence. This is the master key to what otherwise is a maze of unintelligible phenomena. This, indeed, "vindicates the ways of God to man."

With such inferences the teachings of the Prophet of Nazareth are in full accord. To know God is, he declared, to have eternal life. When man entered upon the pursuit of this knowledge he began the final stage of his destiny. The founding of Christianity was incomparably the most significant event since the very beginning of things. Said Senator DAVIS, not long before his death, in language which has already been quoted by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]:

> I know human history, and I know that in the first century something happened that destroyed the old world and gave birth to the new. The resurrection of Jesus would account for that change, and I do not know of any other adequate solution that has ever been proposed.

Thus, it seems to me, the conclusions of philosophy, the rationale of science, and the teachings of revealed religion point unerringly to immortality. In this supreme conviction our great friend departed. Though we may mourn the loss of his companionship, let us find more than consolation in the thought that the soul whose labors seemed so untimely interrupted here is still serenely following, in a more congenial environment, its divinely appointed part in the eternal harmony.

Mr. President, I respectfully ask for the adoption of the resolutions.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 38 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, January 14, 1901, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 12, 1901.

The House met at 12 o'clock m., and was called to order by the Speaker.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read, corrected, and approved.

UNITED STATES COURT, EASTERN DISTRICT OF TENNESSEE.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The bill (H. R. 12546) to change and fix the time for holding the district and circuit courts of the United States for the northeastern division of the eastern district of Tennessee was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the northeastern division of the eastern district of Tennessee, held at Greeneville, Tenn., shall commence on the second Monday in November and May of each year, instead of the fourth Monday in August and February, as is now provided by law, and each of said terms shall continue as long as the presiding judge may deem necessary.

SEC. 2. That no action, suit, proceeding, information, indictment, recognizance, bail bond, or other process in either of said courts shall abate or be rendered invalid by reason of the change of time in the holding of the terms of said courts, but the same shall be deemed to be returnable to, pending, and triable at the terms herein provided for.

SEC. 3. That all laws and parts of laws conflicting with this act be, and are hereby, repealed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I desire to ask the gentleman if this bill is asked for by the Representatives of that judicial district on this floor?

Mr. JENKINS. I did not hear the remark of the gentleman.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I know nothing about the bill myself. It relates to the eastern district of the State, and I was inquiring if the members on this floor who represent the eastern district are satisfied with it. I see they are both on the floor now.

Mr. JENKINS. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that the bill was presented at the request of the judge of that circuit, and it has the indorsement of the Representatives of that district here.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I see these gentlemen are present, and I have nothing further to say.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JENKINS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

JAMES L. PROCTOR.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5599) to correct the military record of James L. Proctor.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of James L. Proctor, of the county of Kings, State of New York, late a private in Company F, Ninetieth Regiment of New York Veteran Volunteers.

The following amendments, recommended by the Committee on Military Affairs, were read:

In line 4, after the word "to," strike out the words "remove the charge of desertion from the military record of" and insert in lieu thereof the words "grant an honorable discharge in lieu of the dishonorable discharge heretofore granted to."

In line 9, after the word "Volunteers," insert "Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

By unanimous consent, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting an honorable discharge to James L. Proctor."

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD of New York, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was ordered to lie on the table.

CERTAIN INDIANS IN THE INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following bill as amended. I ask that the amended bill be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

Mr. LACEY. As amended.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read it as amended, that being the request of the gentleman from Iowa.

The bill (H. R. 8966) for the relief of certain Indians in the Indian Territory who desire to sell their lands and improvements and emigrate elsewhere was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That when at any time 300 or more Indians of the Indian Territory shall request, by petition or through authorized representatives, of the Secretary of the Interior permission to sell or otherwise dispose of their lands and improvements, or any interest therein, in the Indian Territory, or to obtain their distributive share of any money held for them by the Government of the United States which such petitioners may desire to use for the purpose of buying lands elsewhere, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized in his discretion to ascertain their proportionate share of lands and funds, and allot and set aside the same to them, or such part thereof as he may deem proper, and to assist such Indians to sell or dispose of such lands and improvements, or any interest therein, in whole or in part, in the discretion of said Secretary, as may be or may have been allotted and set apart for them, and to give deeds and patents in fee, or execute papers for the United States Government to carry out the desires of said Indians: and he shall see that their rights are protected or secured by the payment to them in full or in part, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, of the moneys due them for such lands, or that good and ample bonds or securities for the payment of such lands be secured to said Indians: Provided, however, That such moneys or bonds shall be held by the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, so long as may be necessary to protect and preserve the rights of such Indians after such transfer, a portion to be paid for such lands as are selected by said Indians, a portion to be used in moving to and improving said lands, and if any is left thereafter, to be paid out as instructed by a majority of the entire band, tribe, or organization so emigrating at any one time, subject to the discretion of the said Secretary: Provided, however, That if any such Indians emigrate or move to a foreign country, the Secretary of the Interior be authorized, and is hereby instructed, to approve of such terms or agreement with such foreign government as will best promote the interest, wishes, and desires of such Indians: And provided further, however, That said Indians so emigrating or separating themselves from the others of their nation or tribe shall not lose any of their rights to participate in any other claims, property, or funds belonging to the nation or tribe of which they are a part which have not been already set aside; and the pro rata share of said property or funds shall, when determined, from time to time be turned over to the Secretary of the Interior, and set apart for them, subject to their order; and that after emigrating from the territory of the United States all reliance and support of said Indians of and by the United States Government shall cease: And provided also, That the Secretary may furnish money for the purposes of this act out of the funds due such Indians, and which he may set apart for that purpose without making sale of their lands, if the Secretary may deem it for the best interest of such Indians so to do. It is expressly declared and understood that the United States in the execution of the provisions of this act incurs no liability whatever.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I want to hear from the gentleman from Iowa before consent is given. It strikes me this bill is very far-reaching and very important, and not that class of bills that ought to come up by unanimous consent. Reserving the right to object, I would like to have a very full explanation from the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I hope we will have order in the House, so that an explanation of the bill may be heard.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It takes away all the right of the Indians.

Mr. LACEY. This is a very important bill, as suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee. It comes before the House with a unanimous report from the Committee on Indian Affairs, after a careful examination. There are some Indians in the Indian Territory who wish to move to Mexico, and some to other parts of the grazing lands in the West. The bill, as introduced, asked Congress for a direct and specific authority to make the removal. The committee did not deem this proper, because the committee could not ascertain all the facts—could not investigate adequately—and therefore concluded that the proper thing to do was to give the Secretary of the Interior such discretion as might enable him, in his discretion, in any proper case to make this transfer. This desire for a transfer grows out of the fact that some 200 Kickapoos—kicking Kickapoos, I believe—emigrated to Mexico, and they have so increased in that climate in twenty years that there are now about 500 of them.

Those of the tribe who remained in the Indian Territory have diminished in number. There are some of the Indians in that Territory who are very subject to pulmonary disease, and they desire a transfer; and for that reason it is believed by the committee that if power were lodged with the Secretary of the Interior to authorize transfers where it was proper, that that should be done instead of coming here to Congress and asking power to transfer each lot of Indians. This being a large body, Congress would find it impossible to make the transfer and properly protect the Indians in making the transfer.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Does it require 300 Indians to ask it at a time?

Mr. LACEY. It is not less than 300 at a time; so as to make a sufficient body, and justify the taking care of them. As a matter of fact, there are a good many hundreds who have made the petition; but it was deemed proper that 300 or more should join, and that the matter should be left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior to look up the lands and investigate the whole matter; and if he deemed it best for their interest under all the circumstances that they should be transferred to authorize it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Under this bill, then, when a body of 300 Indians make this request for transfer the Secretary of the Interior shall investigate that particular case and ascertain whether it is best for the interests of the Indians.

Mr. LACEY. This places it in his discretion; and if he thinks it best for their interests he may authorize the transfer.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Is it obligatory to make this investigation each time?

Mr. LACEY. It is discretionary; so that it is entirely left with him. The committee leave it in a shape so that if the Indians want to make a transfer they would be permitted to do so if it was deemed to be to their interest.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Perhaps I have not made myself clear to the gentleman. What I wanted to know was if the Secretary must pass upon each application as it comes up?

Mr. LACEY. He has to pass on each, so that each transaction of this kind would have to stand on its own individual merits.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That is what I am asking. The gentleman is sure of that?

Mr. LACEY. That has been very carefully considered and guarded. The original bill authorized the direct transfer, but the committee thought it was not the best way. The committee thought the direct authority should not be given by Congress, but that it was best to lodge the discretion with the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MADDOX. Is it not a fact that a number of Indians have become dissatisfied on account of the allotments of land in the Territory?

Mr. LACEY. There are two classes of Indians——

Mr. MADDOX. Is it not a fact that they are encouraged in that dissatisfaction by certain white men who want to get possession of their lands?

Mr. LACEY. There is not a foot of Indian land anywhere that some white man does not want. But let me explain right in that connection. There are two classes of Indians whose desire to move ought to be considered. One class, who are especially adapted to pastoral life, who have not shown themselves adapted to agriculture. Those could be transferred to the short-grass country to their own benefit. There is another class, those who have been sent there from the far North and from the extreme South, and where there has been a radical change of climate, and the climate of the Indian Territory has proved injurious to some of those, the transfer has made them subject to malarial and pulmonary diseases. Those ought to be transferred, or at least ought to have some opportunity for doing so. That is the judgment of the committee. There is another class of Indians, those who do not want to settle down to farming, who take to it slowly, and out of each hundred in a tribe a few could be selected who desired to change; let the discontented element go, and this, no doubt, would very much help the solution of the civilization of the Indian Territory.

At least the Department of the Interior should be empowered to consider and act upon the suggestion.

Mr. MADDOX. This is the preliminary step to get rid of all the Indians in that country?

Mr. LACEY. Not at all; this is merely an opportunity by which some of them can go. Now any individual Indian, after his allotment, and after the time of probation on an allotment has expired, may sell and go where he wants to. Some Indians ought to have that privilege now. Others that are not civilized or advanced enough to go ought not to have it. By this sort of selection it was thought by the committee that there would be no difficulty in solving the question where there is immediate, urgent necessity for action.

Mr. MADDOX. It seems to me that your bill is contrary to the public policy; that is, the policy that has been practiced in this country up to this date. The Indians are the wards of the nation, and you get this consent, which is very easily obtained, as they are ignorant and do not know how to transact their business; certain white men get possession of their territory, and it is the greatest evil that seems to be prevalent down there to-day. Is not this a direct effort on the part of the people to get rid of the Indians to get possession of the property? And in the end will not the Indians become paupers and dependent on the nation?

Mr. LACEY. That is carefully guarded against in this proposition. The wardship of the nation still extends over them and protects them.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Does this bill apply to all the tribes of Indians in the Indian Territory?

Mr. LACEY. Yes; there are only a few Indians who will avail themselves of it. There are a few that urge this permission, and they sought to have a bill drawn to fit their case. We felt that we could not carefully frame such a bill, and we thought it best to frame one so that each case might be investigated.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I would be glad if the gentleman would read that part of the bill which shows that each request must be passed upon under the special observation of the Secretary of the Interior. I have been unable to get a copy of the bill.

Mr. LACEY. That is in the first part of the bill. I will read it:

That when at any time 300 or more Indians of the Indian Territory shall request, by petition or through authorized representatives, of the Secretary of the Interior permission to sell or otherwise dispose of their lands and improvements, or any interest therein, in the Indian Territory, or to obtain their distributive share of any money held for them by the Government of the United States which such petitioners may desire to use for the purpose of buying lands elsewhere, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to ascertain their proportionate share of lands and funds, and allot and set aside the same to them, etc.

It is entirely tentative and permissive. It is not mandatory in any sense of the word. It is a power that ought to have been granted long ago, and would have worked for the benefit of the Indian. I will say to my friend from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX] that it does not contemplate any such transaction as occurred years ago in the State of Georgia, where the Indians were rounded up and driven from the State. Nothing of that kind is contemplated. We have got way beyond the period when there was actual hostility to the Indians on the part of the whites.

Mr. MADDOX. I want to say to the gentleman that when the Indians were rounded up in Georgia and Alabama, if ever a nation entered into a solemn compact to protect their rights in the new acquisition it was in that treaty, and we bound ourselves to keep it in good faith as long as water runs down hill and grass grows.

Mr. LACEY. That is true, and this proposition absolutely carries that out in the utmost good faith. Nothing is done, except upon their own petition, as long as water runs down hill and grass grows. They ought to have the permission, if they can better themselves and their condition, to do so. The gentleman from Georgia must remember that they are in a different condition from what they were when they left Georgia. Many of these men rival in intelligence the gentlemen on the floor of the House. Many are educated——

Mr. MADDOX. The gentleman from Iowa will understand that they were the most intelligent Indians in the United States at the time they left Georgia.

Mr. LACEY. Undoubtedly; they were descended largely from the Georgia people. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDOX. They were bound to be. [Laughter.] I do not want to be captious in making objections, but I do want to investigate the bill, which is a very important one.

Mr. LACEY. The bill was unanimously reported by the committee. The bill was called up the other day and read in full, but was laid over because it was private bill day. It was called up the last session and laid over "because the Coeur d'Alene testimony had not been printed." So this is the third time that the bill has been explained to this House.

Mr. MADDOX. Suppose the gentleman lets it lie over until Monday next.

Mr. LACEY. This is the third time it has been explained, and the bill has been printed in full in the RECORD. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LEWIS] joined with the committee in the unanimous report of the bill. I am sorry the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX] was not on the committee.

Mr. MADDOX. I will say to the gentleman that I served four years on that committee and I happen to know something about this business, and that is the reason I am talking about it now. For that reason I would like to look into the bill. I have been watching this thing for some time.

Mr. LACEY. This is an entirely new proposition in its present form; and I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that it is purely tentative.

If the bill be passed, I will agree to make no motion to reconsider and lay on the table; the bill may lie over subject to a motion for reconsideration. That will give my friend ample opportunity to examine the matter. Or, upon the passage of the bill, he may enter a motion to reconsider and afterwards press that motion or not, as he may decide after examination.

Mr. MADDOX. That is a rather poor method of proceeding.

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman will be perfectly safe, because the motion to reconsider is privileged.

Mr. MADDOX. I am perfectly safe now, but by the course suggested I would have all the advantages against me. I again suggest that the gentleman postpone this matter until Monday, so that we may look the matter over together.

Mr. LACEY. I may not get recognition on Monday. This is the third time the bill has been read and explained in the House. I am sorry my friend was not here before.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDOX. I shall have to object.

FRANK B. CASE.

Mr. COWHERD. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 11590) for the relief of Frank B. Case.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and is hereby, authorized to appoint Frank B. Case, of Missouri, a line officer in the Navy, to take rank at the foot of his original class and next after Simon Cook, and said Case shall thereafter be carried as additional to the numbers of each grade to which he is appointed or thereafter at any time promoted, and he shall perform shore duty or such duty at sea as the physical disability for which he was retired will permit, and the provisions of section 1494 of the Revised Statutes are hereby made applicable to his case: Provided, That the said Case shall establish to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy by examination, pursuant to law, his mental, moral, professional, and physical fitness to perform the shore duties of a lieutenant or of the grade to which he may be appointed

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOPKINS. I shall be compelled to object for the present.

Mr. COWHERD. I hope the gentleman will allow me to explain the matter.

Mr. HOPKINS. I want to know whether this is going to interfere with some young men in the Navy in whom I have an interest.

Mr. COWHERD. If the gentleman will allow me to explain I think he will see that the bill can not have any such effect. I trust he will withhold his objection for the present.

Mr. HOPKINS. Very well; reserving the right to object, I am willing to listen to the gentleman's explanation.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Speaker, this is one of the few cases in the history of the Navy. I believe there are one or two others of similar nature. There are certainly not more than two or three cases where an officer has been wholly retired from the service on account of a physical disability when there was no question touching his moral conduct or character. This case, however, goes further than that. If absolute justice were done, this gentleman, instead of being retired from the Navy, would have gone on the retired list with pay in accordance with the compensation given to officers retired for disability incurred in service.

The facts are these: Mr. Case was appointed a cadet and passed all the examinations to which cadets entering that Academy are subjected. He went through the full course and graduated. On his second trip, he was sent as one of the force on the relief expedition in search of the Jeannette. The navigating officer of the ship was taken sick, so that during almost that entire voyage he had to occupy the position of navigating officer, and was compelled to be on deck and keep watch. When he returned from that voyage, he was immediately summoned to take an examination for promotion. The doctors then found that he was suffering from color-blindness. Mark you, he had passed at least three examinations prior to this time, and no color-blindness had been found. This, I think, was the first case where upon such an examination a man had been found to be color-blind and relieved for that cause. The physicians then held that color-blindness was congenital; that no man could acquire color-blindness by reason of his service. Therefore they held that this man ought never to have been received in the Navy, and that he ought to be wholly retired, instead of being placed on the retired list.

It is now, however, recognized by medical authorities that color-blindness may be either congenital or acquired, and among the things given by the authorities as most likely to cause color-blindness is exposure to the glare of the sunlight from ice fields and from large territories covered with snow. The authorities cite cases of color-blindness caused by exactly such circumstances as those to which Mr. Case was subjected on the trip taken just before his examination.

He was totally retired—a proceeding unprecedented practically in the Navy—when there was not anything against the efficiency of his service or against his character. When the Spanish war broke out he offered his services to the Government. He was sent down to be examined, and was passed. Of course he was asked whether he had ever seen service, and the history of his case was given to the examining board. He was given another examination, and two of the three doctors passed him again. Then, at the earnest solicitation of the other physician, he was given a third examination and was rejected, although the color-blindness which appeared was at that time very slight.

This gentleman is fully qualified to perform all the duties of an officer. He stands high. He is at present engaged in the Department on civilian work. As I have said, if justice had been done him he would either be on the regular force or be wholly retired with full compensation. Now, all we ask is that he be allowed to reenter the service and stand at the foot of his class (I think that before his retirement he stood about the center), and that he be carried on the roster as an additional officer, so that he will not interfere with the rights of anyone else.

Mr. HOPKINS. How long has he been out of the service?

Mr. COWHERD. I think the report will show that he has been out about ten years or more. Upon reflection, I think he was retired about 1883.

Mr. HOPKINS. And this proposition is to put him into active service again?

Mr. COWHERD. Yes, to put him into active service—such service as he is competent to perform; and he is competent to perform any except where color-blindness may interfere.

Mr. HOPKINS. The only object in putting him back there would be to put him on the retired list.

Mr. COWHERD. Oh, no.

Mr. HOPKINS. He can not have active service because of his color-blindness.

Mr. COWHERD. He can. He can perform any service, except where this defect interferes. In fact, he is now performing service in the Department as a civilian employee. A bill was introduced to put him on the retired list, and this bill was drawn up at the suggestion of the committee and following a precedent that has been established in a former case, recommended, as I understand, in the former case, by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. HOPKINS. I desire to look into the matter, and, for the present, I will object.

Mr. COWHERD. If justice was done him, he would go on the retired list; but he does not want that. He is a young man and is capable of serving.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will look into the matter.

CERTAIN INDIANS IN THE INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia withdraw his objection to the request presented some time ago by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] for the present consideration of a bill?

Mr. MADDOX. Subject to the adoption of certain amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY]?

Mr. FINLEY. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. I should like to ask whether these Indians, who are now by the provisions of this bill to sell their lands and buy lands elsewhere in the United States, will hold the lands which they buy elsewhere under like limitations and restrictions as their lands are now held by them in the Indian Territory?

Mr. LACEY. That matter is placed in the discretion of the Secretary, and with the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX] will require the approval of the President as well. He thinks there should be an additional restriction, but we do not object to any restriction that will protect the Indians in this matter. The committee endeavored to insert all that they thought necessary to protect them.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman agree to an amendment that they shall hold the lands bought elsewhere in the United States under like limitations and restrictions as the lands that they now hold in the Indian Territory are held?

The gentleman from Iowa has stated here that some of these Indians have not yet reached that point of civilization that entitles them to deal with their lands with entire freedom. Now, if that is true in all such cases, should not the Secretary of the Interior look after the interests of those Indians when lands are being purchased elsewhere?

Mr. LACEY. I shall not object to an amendment of that kind, if the gentleman will prepare it. It can be added as a proviso at the end of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Let the committee amendments be disposed of first.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX] has some amendments which he desires to offer.

Mr. MADDOX. I want to have the bill amended in line 11 by inserting "with the approval of the President" after the word authorize."

The Clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

After the word "authorize," in line 11, page 1, insert the words "with the approval of the President."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MADDOX. In line 6, page 2, after the word "Secretary," I move to insert "with the approval of the President."

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 6, page 2, after the word "Secretary," insert "with the approval of the President."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MADDOX. In line 12, page 2, after the word "Interior," I move to insert "with the approval of the President."

The amendment was read, as follows:

On page 2, line 12, after the word "Interior," insert "with the approval of the President."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MADDOX. In line 16, after the word "Interior," I move to insert "with the approval of the President."

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 16, page 2, after the word "Interior," insert "with the approval of the President."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MADDOX. On page 2, line 25, after the word "Interior," I move to insert "with the approval of the President."

The amendment was read, as follows:

On page 2, line 25, after the word "Interior," insert "with the approval of the President."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MADDOX. In line 18, page 3, after the word "Secretary," I move to insert "with the approval of the President."

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 18, page 3, after the word "Secretary," insert "with the approval of the President."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FINLEY. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina offers the following amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the lands so repurchased in the United States shall be held by the purchasers under like limitations as those held at present.

The SPEAKER. Where does this come in?

Mr. FINLEY. At the end of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LACEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

GRAND PORTAGE INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The bill (H. R. 10664) granting permission to the Indians on the Grand Portage Indian Reservation, in the State of Minnesota, to cut and dispose of the timber on their several allotments on said reservation, was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Indians on the Grand Portage Indian Reservation, in the State of Minnesota, shall be, and they are hereby, permitted to cut and dispose of the timber on their several allotments, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. McRAE. I should like to have the bill reported again. My attention was diverted at the time of the reading.

The bill was again read.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, if the gentleman wants to say anything. It looks as though this bill was intended to allow the Indians to sell their timber lands without any restriction, and I do not think it is the kind of a bill that ought to pass. My friend and I have had some experience with timber lands in that part of the country, and, as a rule, the man that they sell to gets it all and the Indian gets nothing.

Mr. MORRIS. If the gentleman will allow me to make an explanation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. MORRIS. I think I can make it clear to my friend. You will notice that the language of this bill is to permit the Indians of this little reservation not to dispose of their lands at all, but to cut and dispose of the timber on their allotments. Now, this is a little reservation in the northeast corner of the State of Minnesota. The lands which have been allotted to the Indians are not valuable for merchantable timber in the ordinary acceptation of that term. They are, to some extent, valuable for the cedar posts and paving blocks which are on these allotments. The object of this bill is to give these Indians the right to cut and dispose of this kind of timber in order that they may have some occupation in winter, and also to piece out the meager annuities which they receive from the Government.

I will say to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that since I have been in this House I have been obliged to make application to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to furnish supplies to these Indians in the winter time in order to keep them from starvation. The idea of this bill is simply to provide that they may be able to dispose of this timber so as to give them something to do, and also to piece out their annuities which they receive from the Government. I will further say to the gentleman from Alabama that I took up this matter with the present Commissioner of Indian Affairs, who is perhaps as particular about the disposal of any timber lands of the Indians as any Commissioner of Indian Affairs has ever been.

I went over this matter thoroughly with him, and he, with a full knowledge of the facts, said he thought it would be not only advisable but the very best thing that could be done that such a bill as this should be passed, but that this timber should be cut and disposed of under such regulations as the Indian Department should prescribe. In conformity with his suggestion I prepared the bill as it is now presented, and there is a report here, from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs or from the Secretary of the Interior, favoring the passage of the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like to hear the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. MORRIS. The report is on the Clerk's desk. It comes in the shape of a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, but it went through the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the communication.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, April 26, 1900.

SIR: The office is in receipt, by Department reference of April 23, 1900, for report, of a letter dated April 20, 1900, from Hon. J. S. Sherman, chairman of the House Committee on Indian Affairs, transmitting H. R. 10664, entitled "A bill granting permission to the Indians on the Grand Portage Indian Reservation, in the State of Minnesota, to cut and dispose of the timber on their several allotments on said reservation."

The bill is as follows:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of America in Congress assembled, That the Indians on the Grand Portage Indian Reservation, in the State of Minnesota, shall be, and they are hereby, permitted to cut and dispose of the timber on their several allotments under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior."

The Chippewa Commission, appointed and acting under the provisions of the act of Congress approved January 14, 1889 (25 Stats., 642), has allotted 24,191.31 acres of land on the Grand Portage Reservation to 304 Indians of said reservation. Said commission completed its work and made its report September 12, 1896. Said report was approved by this office November 4, 1896, and by the Department November 9, 1896.

As the bill under consideration vests in the Department entire control of the cutting and disposition of the timber on the allotments on the Grand Portage Reservation, as most of the land is unfit for agricultural purposes, as there is but little timber upon it, and as the annuities of the Grand Portage Indians are small, the office is of the opinion that the bill should be enacted into law, and recommends that the honorable Chairman of the House Committee on Indian Affairs be so advised.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. C. TONNER,
Acting Commissioner.

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I see from the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs that there is very little timber on that reservation, and for that reason I will not object. My experience has been that where the Indians have occupied timber lands and have been allowed to dispose of timber the contractor gets all and the Indian gets nothing. In this case it seems that there is very little there.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MORRIS, the motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ARIZONA WATER COMPANY.

Mr. WILSON of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10667) to authorize the Arizona Water Company to construct power plant on Pima Indian Reservation in Maricopa County, Ariz.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Arizona Water Company, its successors and assigns, be, and it hereby is, authorized to erect, construct, maintain, and operate a water-power plant at the place on the Indian reservation set apart for the Pima and Maricopa Indians by Executive order dated June 14, 1879, in the county of Maricopa, Territory of Arizona, where the Arizona Canal, by means of a crosscut canal, drops a portion of the water back into the Salt River theretofore taken out by its dam and head gate. Said Arizona Water Company, its successors or assigns, is also authorized to erect, construct, and maintain the necessary poles and wires for the purpose of transmitting across said reservation, at the most practicable and convenient route, the electricity to be generated by such power plant: Provided, however, That said Arizona Water Company, its successors or assigns, shall at all times save and protect all persons on said Indian reservation from any and all damages which may be caused by the erection and maintenance of said power plant, pole line, and wires used in connection therewith.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KLEBERG, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

DAM AT OR NEAR KNOXVILLE, TENN.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12099) to grant the Knoxville Power Company the right to dam the Tennessee River, at or near Knoxville, Tenn.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Knoxville Power Company, of Konxville, Tenn., be, and is hereby, authorized to construct a lock and dam across the Tennessee River at or near Knoxville, for the purpose of furnishing power for lighting, manufacturing, and other purposes.

SEC. 2. That said company, in the construction and operation of said lock and dam, shall conform to all the conditions and requirements that may be made by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 3. That before beginning the work the Knoxville Power Company shall file with the Secretary of War the plans, drawings, specifications, etc., to be used in connection with the construction of said lock and dam, and shall have his approval thereof, and until such approval is given the structure shall not be commenced.

SEC. 4. That the work of construction of said lock and dam shall be carried on in such a manner as not to unnecessarily interrupt or impede navigation while it is in progress; and when constructed the lock and dam shall be operated at the cost and expense of the said Knoxville Power Company: Provided, That the works shall be so constructed and operated as not to interfere in any way with the regular flow of water in the river, and any ponding up or storing the water during certain periods so as to use it more rapidly during other periods is hereby prohibited: Provided further, That the said company shall be responsible for any damage or injury inflicted upon navigation interests by said works or by reason of the failure of the said company to comply with any conditions or requirements made by the Secretary of War in respect thereto, and the said company shall also be responsible for any damage to private property resulting from overflow, and any litigation arising from any of these causes may be tried in the courts of the United States for the district in which the said works are situated: Provided further, That should the works at any time and for any cause whatever become an unreasonable obstruction to navigation, the Secretary of War shall have authority to direct and compel the Knoxville Power Company to make such changes as may be necessary to obviate such obstruction at the expense of the said Knoxville Power Company.

SEC. 5. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the works be not commenced within two years and completed within five years from the date hereof.

SEC. 6. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will reserve the right to object if the gentleman wishes to say anything.

Mr. GIBSON. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama that this bill was reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in lieu of the one I introduced on the same subject, and is, in effect, recommended by the Secretary of War, by General Wilson, and by Major Kingman. It will improve the navigation of the Tennessee River without any cost to the Government. The whole matter will be under the charge of the War Department. The expenses of operating the locks are all borne by the company. The United States is put to no expense. It is an improvement of the navigation of the river at a cost of over $400,000, and possibly a half million of dollars. Major Kingman says it is the very sort of improvement that the Tennessee River needs, and therefore it is recommended by the engineering department of the Government.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman if this river is navigable at this place at this time?

Mr. GIBSON. It is navigable in ordinary water. This improves the navigation for a distance of 20 miles above Knoxville.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. How many months of the year is the river navigable at present?

Mr. GIBSON. Eight months, and often all the year round, for light-draft boats.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And you propose to put a dam there to improve the navigation?

Mr. GIBSON. To improve the navigation above Knoxville. But the dam is to be so constructed that boats can pass it by means of a lock.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Is there anything in this bill that prevents the company charging lockage?

Mr. GIBSON. Locks are provided for, all at the expense of the company, and under the control of the War Department.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Is there anything in this bill that prohibits the company charging the commerce of the river lockage?

Mr. GIBSON. Yes; all lockage is done free.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the bill state that?

Mr. GIBSON. It expressly provides it in the bill. A similar bill is also before the Senate, and the Senate Committee on Commerce has added two small amendments, which I propose to add, that the lock and dam shall be operated free of cost or charge to all vessels passing through the same, and at the cost and expense of the Knoxville Power Company.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the gentleman from Tennessee that the people of my State are largely interested in the Tennessee River. The bill may be a very good one, but it is the first time I have heard of it, and I am not willing to have it go through by unanimous consent, without looking into it to satisfy myself that it is all right, because it evidently surrenders the whole control of that river to a private corporation. I object for the present.

EDWARD EVERETT HAYDEN.

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 2384) for the relief of Edward Everett Hayden, an ensign on the retired list of the Navy.

Whereas Ensign Edward Everett Hayden, United States Navy, was placed upon the retired list of the Navy by reason of the loss of a leg, resulting from an accident incurred in the line of duty; and

Whereas sections 1493 and 1494 of the Revised Statutes of the United States permit an officer of the Navy who has been wounded in the line of duty to remain upon the active list while capable of performing other than sea duty; and

Whereas several other officers of the Navy suffering from similar disability for sea duty have been, and are now, retained on the active list, in accordance with the above-mentioned sections of the Revised Statutes; and

Whereas the said Edward Everett Hayden has been, since his retirement, engaged in scientific study and work of value to and under the direction of the Navy Department, including service during the war with Spain, when he volunteered for active duty and served creditably and longer than any other retired officer of the Navy: Therefore, that justice may be done the said Edward Everett Hayden and that the Navy Department may be enabled to command his services during peace as well as war, in accordance with the above-mentioned sections of the Revised Statutes,

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of law regulating appointments in the Navy by promotion in the line and limiting the number of lieutenants to be appointed in the United States naval service are hereby suspended for the purpose of this act only, and only so far as they affect Edward Everett Hayden; and the President of the United States is hereby authorized, in the exercise of his discretion and judgment, to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint said Edward Everett Hayden, now an ensign on the retired list of the Navy of the United States, to the grade and rank of lieutenant on the active list of the Navy, as of the date of May 1, 1895, and to place his name in the Register of the Navy next after that of his classmate John Hood: Provided, That the said Hayden shall establish to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy, upon examination by a board of officers convened pursuant to the provisions of section 1496 of the Revised Statutes, his mental, moral, and professional fitness to perform the shore duties of a lieutenant, and before a medical board, pursuant to the provisions of sections 1493 and 1494 of said statutes, that his existing physical disqualification was occasioned by wounds received in the line of his duty, and that such wounds do not incapacitate him for duties other than sea duty in the grade of lieutenant: And provided further, That he shall receive no pay or emoluments by reason of such reappointment to the active list of the Navy except from the date of such reappointment, and that he shall be additional to the number of officers prescribed by law for the grade of lieutenant in the Navy, and in any grade to which he may hereafter be advanced.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MEYER of Louisiana, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BEACON LIGHT ON HAMBROOK BAR, CHOPTANK RIVER, MARYLAND.

Mr. KERR of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13399) for the establishment of a beacon light on Hambrook Bar, Choptank River, Maryland, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to have established a beacon light on Hambrook Bar, Choptank River, Maryland, and beacon range lights to guide into the harbor of Cambridge, Md., at a cost not to exceed $10,000.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KERR of Maryland, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSISSIPPI RIVER AT OR NEAR CAPE GIRARDEAU.

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10846) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Cape Girardeau, Missouri.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. VANDIVER. To save time, I ask that the reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. This is a bridge bill, and the gentleman asks unanimous consent to dispense with the further reading of the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. VANDIVER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EDWARD B. HOWARD.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3135) to correct the military record of Lieut. Edward B. Howard.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to amend the military record of Lieut. Edward B. Howard, Company G, Fourteenth New Hampshire Volunteers, and grant him an honorable discharge.

With the following amendment, recommended by the Committee on Military Affairs:

Add at the end of the bill the following:

"Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STEELE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

RIVERS AND HARBORS.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 13189, the river and harbor bill.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. HOPKINS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is now in session pursuant to the direction of the House, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title to the bill, as follows:

A bill making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Chairman, if I did not feel that a public duty rested upon me to do so, I should not trespass upon the time of the committee this morning, for I am extremely unwell; but in view of the very ferocious and savage attack which was made by my good and honored friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], in accordance with his usual custom, upon that feature of the pending bill in which my constituents are most deeply concerned, I do not feel that I ought to remain silent.

I listened, Mr. Chairman, with great admiration to the performance of my friend. I admired his superb diction, his attractive delivery, his great intellectual activity, and his commanding presence, and in this I think I reflect the sentiments of all who listened to him. It has always been a pleasure to me to hear him speak. I have always acquired from him a great deal of information, and at times, Mr. Chairman, a vast amount of misinformation. [Laughter.]

I have listened to him also with great regret; a regret that his splendid abilities were mercilessly turned against what I regard as the most important and beneficent feature of this bill. I have always cherished the hope that at some time before I retired from Congress I would enjoy the pleasure of seeing his magnificent powers enlisted in behalf of this cause which I have so much at heart. His speech on the day before yesterday warned me, however, that that hope, which I have so long hugged to my breast, must take its place in the limbo of the wreckage of other disappointments which have come to me in my life.

I regret that I have not had the opportunity to read in print what he said in that speech, for I was much disturbed while he was addressing the committee, and therefore fear that I did not catch all of his observations. But it will be my effort, in part at least, to clear away some of the mist and vapor with which he surrounded his topic.

In the first place, I wish to correct his statement that all commerce on the Mississippi River has practically disappeared. As against that I will place the statement which was recently made to me by a friend of mine, an honorable and upright gentleman, and particularly informed as to all matters pertaining to the navigation and commerce upon that river. That statement was to the effect that never at any time in its history has so large and valuable a commerce floated upon the bosom of that mighty stream. The character of the commerce has changed, and because its character changed my good and honored friend has fallen into the delusion that the commerce itself has substantially disappeared. There was a time when there were no railroads, Mr. Chairman, penetrating that valley, either from the North or the South, the East or the West. And in those days the great through traffic from the West necessarily found its way to the southern communities along that river by means of steamboats.

Unquestionably since the advent of these railroads there has been a great falling off in this through commerce. But the cities and towns in that valley have become so greatly augmented in importance, there are so many more people dwelling within its limits, there are so many more commercial communities there engaged in business that even with this through commerce considerably eliminated there remains a quantity vaster and more valuable than in the early days, when the large and costly steamboats made so conspicuous and ostentatious a display.

But the great through traffic that comes down the railways which penetrate the valley along the sides of this noble stream is discharged at points of distribution such as Cairo, Memphis, Greenville, Vicksburg, Baton Rouge, New Orleans, and numerous other ports, and from them it is distributed to the dwellers of the valley, and that distribution takes place by local steamers which constantly arrive and depart. So the change is merely in the character of the commerce, and not in the aggregate amount of it.

Undoubtedly but for the construction of these railways the traffic upon the river would be greater still, for it would then have comprised not only this distribution from local points which I have described, but also the through traffic which now goes by rail.

I believe I have said enough on this point. I will, however, add that if my friend be correct—if the value of that stream as a commercial artery has entirely or substantially ceased to exist—the business men of the city of St. Louis, which lies at the head of navigation of the lower river, are greatly in error. I hold in my hand a memorial to the Congress of the United States, which is signed by every business association in that city, asking and pleading that liberal and extensive appropriations be made in order that they may better utilize this stream in conducting its commerce.

Before discussing questions relating to the work upon the river I will take up another error into which my good friend has fallen. In his great desire to find something upon which to launch his criticism and invective he made reference to the improvement which is in contemplation at the Southwest Pass of the Mississippi River, which pertains to and properly constitutes part of the harbor of the city of New Orleans. He stated that when the work of improving the South Pass began, in 1875, it was founded upon what he designates as the principle of contraction, by which he meant such concentration of the water that it would scour out a channel sufficient to enable vessels to enter and depart. He avers that in the improvement of the great Southwest Pass, for which this bill provides, the principle of contraction has been abandoned and that of diffusion, as he calls it, substituted.

Mr. Chairman, my friend was mistaken in both statements. The principle of concentration was applied, it is true, to a considerable degree in the construction of what are known as the Eads jetties, which began in 1875. The Mississippi River makes its exit to the Gulf through three mouths. The center one is called the South Pass; the one to the east is called the Southeast Pass, and the one to the west is called the Southwest Pass. About 93 per cent of all the water of the Mississippi River goes out, and substantially that quantity has always gone out, through the Southwest and the Southeast passes. There does not go to-day through the South Pass, according to the testimony, more than 7 per cent of the total volume of the Mississippi River. That pass at no time has carried more than 10 or 11 per cent.

Thus it will be seen that my good friend is entirely mistaken in his declaration that when the Eads jetties were undertaken the plan was to force all the water of the river to find its exit through a single one of the Passes. If he had given sufficient attention to the physical conditions at the mouth of the river he would have seen how utterly impossible it is to apply, to the extent stated by him, what he calls the principle of concentration. If members of the committee will turn to a map portraying the physical features there existing they will find that the sediment which has been brought down by the river during the centuries has been spread over an extensive area having very much the shape of a fan, and that the three Passes into which the river is there divided work their way through this formation to the Gulf, having banks so narrow that a stone may almost be cast across them. Being composed of extremely friable soil, these banks are so fragile that if there were any extensive concentration of water between them they would be rent asunder and wholly destroyed. If the banks of these Passes were firm and stable, there would be no substantial difficulty, by suitable concentration works, in securing any depth desired through the bar at the mouth of the river.

When Mr. Eads proposed his enterprise to the Congress of the United States he was compelled, against his wishes, to take the South Pass, which is the most inferior of the three, upon which to make his experiment. It proved to be extremely difficult by concentration works to secure just the quantity of water needed to scour out the Pass to the required dimensions, and the channel has been maintained by means of dredging in connection with the jetties, which has been carried on with more or less constancy. It is largely through dredging operations that we expect to secure and maintain a 35-foot channel through the magnificent Southwest Pass.

And the money which the Government proposes to expend for that purpose will be returned many fold. I had in my possession, but unfortunately have mislaid it, a clipping which I took a few days since from the New York Tribune, giving figures as to the commerce now passing through the mouth of the river. Those figures absolutely startled me. The statement was that last year one hundred and forty-five millions of exports went out from the city of New Orleans, and that her imports had also largely increased, thus showing that New Orleans is treading fast upon the heels of Boston as the second commercial port in the United States. New Orleans to-day is, and for many years has been, the second city so far as exports are concerned. And this one hundred and forty-five millions, Mr. Chairman, was made up largely from the contributions of the people of the great valley in whose behalf I propose to speak to-day. They are not mendicants; they are not paupers; they are enterprising, substantial, brave, and courageous people, who are contributing their full share to swell the magnificent industries and commerce of this country.

Mr. Chairman, there has never been so much misrepresentation, so much misunderstanding, so much perversion and distortion of the truth regarding anything on this earth as is invariably manifested whenever there comes to be a discussion of the improvement of the Lower Mississippi River. My good friend [Mr. HEPBURN], in the course of his speech the other day, made the statement that while only about fifteen or sixteen million dollars had been actually expended by the Government for levee construction, yet that the balance of the appropriations which have been made for the improvement of the lower river, something like twenty-five millions, must also be charged up to levee construction. He reached this conclusion by the disingenuous assertion that there was never any real purpose to improve the river, and that but for the pressure for aid in levee construction these twenty-five millions would never have been expended.

A gentleman who makes it his specialty to assault upon all occasions the progress of this great work ought at least to have informed himself of its origin. I say to him now and to members of the committee here that this great enterprise was not inaugurated at the instance of those who are concerned in cultivating the plantations in the Mississippi Valley. It did not have its genesis in any aspiration or desire upon their part to have the Government construct the levees necessary to protect them from the tremendous floods which annually work their way down to the Gulf. It came, I might almost say, as the legitimate offspring of the great success which had come to Mr. Eads in the splendid works constructed by him at the mouth of the river. As if by magic, the idea seemed at once to permeate the atmosphere that by the principle of concentration this great river could be improved, that the sand bars could be cut away, and that a channel might be opened sufficient, as some enthusiasts said, to allow even ocean-going vessels to ascend to the city of St. Louis.

And so, in the midst of the enthusiasm resulting from the success of Captain Eads's great work, the Mississippi River Commission was created. It came at the behest and urgency of the citizens of the great cities of St. Louis and New Orleans. It had its genesis, I repeat, solely, absolutely, and entirely in the belief and expectations of those great cities that the river might thus be so treated that it could be utilized to its greatest and fullest extent.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there naturally came about, as one of the features of that improvement, because of the impulse which caused its inauguration, the notion that the floods should be confined so as to effect the desired concentration of the water. It was believed by many of our able engineers that the confinement of the floods by means of levees would aid in scouring the channel and clearing the path for the vehicles of commerce.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. Is it not a fact that the people of riparian States along the Mississippi expended a very great deal of money in levee construction before the Mississippi River Commission began its operations?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Yes; it is a fact. I am coming to that presently.

Mr. MONDELL. Is it not also a fact that the riparian States have expended something like $20,000,000 in levee construction in the last twenty years?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Well, yes, it is true. They have expended very much more than that altogether.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman allow me another question?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Is it the opinion of the gentleman that the levees do, as a matter of fact, aid the navigation of the Mississippi River?

Mr. CATCHINGS. I will come to that presently. I am going to discuss all features of the work before I finish.

Now, Mr. Chairman, when this work began it was the belief of those who constituted the Mississippi River Commission, and Captain Eads himself in those days was a member, that this great work might be accomplished for a sum far less than experience has shown to be necessary. Some engineers believed that confinement of the floods would so deepen the river that in time levees of comparatively insignificant dimensions would suffice to prevent overflows. In 1882, three years after the creation of the commission, it made its first contribution to levee building. Nobody at that time knew, and nobody could tell, to what extent the flood line would be elevated by the confinement of the floods which had theretofore roamed largely at will over the greater part of the valley. Those who have been engaged in the work have had much to learn, for at the beginning there was no lamp of experience to guide them. No work comparable to it either in character or magnitude had been anywhere prosecuted. And so it is not to be wondered at that distinguished engineers may in some details have been at fault in their early prognostications.

As participation by the Government in levee building progressed it became necessary as a matter of course that the people themselves should make greater and greater expenditures. It is the fact that since levee building began the people of the lower valley have expended something like $34,000,000 of their own means, as against about $16,000,000 expended by the Government. So it will be seen by gentlemen of the committee that they have done their full duty. It is also true that, to meet the higher flood level which was caused by the operations of the Government in given localities, some districts have been obliged to strain their resources to the utmost.

The whole valley of the Mississippi was built up by sediment brought down and deposited by the river itself. Away back in the countless ages of the past the Mississippi River broke through the foothills of the Ozark Mountains, which cross it a few miles above Commerce, which is not a great distance above the city of Cairo.

It is believed that at that time there was an arm of the sea extending to that point and that the Mississippi in tumbling into the sea formed a waterfall something like 500 feet in height. As the detritus from the Mississippi and the Ohio rivers and the Arkansas and the St. Francis and others which also emptied into this arm of the sea, I say as the detritus from all these great streams came pouring in there gradually began the formation of what we know to-day as the alluvial plains of the Mississippi delta. The ocean was gradually pushed back farther and farther by this huge mass of sediment until finally we have it as it is to-day. The result of this process is that the Mississippi River, as is true, indeed, of all great alluvial streams, flows through a bed of its own creation. Its banks and its bed are constituted of the same soil which you find throughout the whole valley.

The banks of the Mississippi, like those of all silt-bearing streams which are overtopped by floods, are always higher than the lands farther back. This comes from the very simple proposition that when such rivers get in flood, with the water overflowing their banks, whereby a lateral current is created, the heaviest portions of the sediment being transported are dropped first, the lighter particles next, and so on, so that some distance back the water is practically denuded of its sediment. Take the Mississippi River, for instance, as an illustration. The land slopes back some 5 or 6 feet to the mile. The same condition prevails in greater or less degree as to all the interior streams. The early settlers sought the high lands on the banks of the Mississippi River and of the interior streams, and in those days I think I may safely affirm it had not entered the mind of any man that within this or the next or the next or the next generation any serious attempt would be made to occupy and cultivate the low back lands of the valley. It was then a comparatively easy matter for the settlers to substantially protect themselves from overflow.

It was quite sufficient to construct an inexpensive and small levee along the high bank and then a cross levee going back to the lowlands. That was the whole of it. The remainder of the great valley, containing 32,000 square miles, in times of flood was a vast reservoir filled up with water. Not being confined, the water did not rise to so great a height, and so they were safe and protected. If it had not been for the existence of slavery it may well be doubted whether for many generations any extensive occupancy, even of the high lands I have described, would have been attempted. But having full command of the labor of their slaves, and attracted by the extraordinary fertility of the soil, the planters gradually entered the valley and settled upon the high lands bordering upon the Mississippi River and upon the interior streams. By using their slave labor at times when it could be spared they threw up the small embankments described, which were measurably sufficient for their protection. As the population increased the levee line was correspondingly lengthened, and as the water was thus more and more confined the flood level was gradually heightened and levees were made higher and stronger. It thus became necessary to organize levee districts to do the work. Thus it went on until 1882, when the Government made its first contribution.

There was then a very considerable system of levees, but nothing to be compared with what we have to-day, either in height or in width or in costliness. While ineffective against great floods they nevertheless sufficed, under conditions then prevailing, to afford considerable protection to those who dwelt behind them. So I say to you now, what seems not to be generally understood, that the settlement of the low back lands which were formerly regarded as worthless, is entirely because of the enormous impetus given to levee building because of the contributions which have come from the Federal Treasury. Prior to the interposition of the Government the planters, burdensome and hazardous as their condition was, had accepted it as inevitable, and were doing the best they could through their levee organizations. The river commission was not created at their instance, but through the commercial influences of the great cities of New Orleans and St. Louis. But when the Government began its experiments in levee building it became necessary that these levee districts should actively cooperate in building the levees higher and stronger, and this cooperation was heartily rendered, for the hope thus came to them that full and complete safety might thereby be secured. From that time the work has gone on and on, and in the doing of it the citizens have imposed taxes upon themselves, never, I believe, elsewhere equaled.

My friend from Iowa, who must be familiar with all that I have stated, should not have been so ungenerous as to demand that the people who are interested in the problems of flood protection should be held responsible for the twenty-five millions, of which not a dollar has been received by them.

Not more, I believe, than one-third of the Mississippi Valley, taken as an entirety, is now being cultivated; yet the splendid exports of the city of New Orleans, to which I have alluded, afford an ample test of its magnificent productivity. I believe the Mississippi Valley is capable of producing more cotton than the American people now consume. I believe it is capable of producing the major portion of the sugar needed by them. I believe it is capable of producing as much rice as they consume. I believe that its supplies of hardwood are such as would meet their wants for generations. It is thus easy to foresee the vast profit which will come to them from its full and complete development and protection.

Mr. Chairman, as this work has progressed sundry theories have been exploited which have tended to confuse the public mind, and greatly obstruct and embarrass the efforts of those who have befriended it.

For instance I invite attention to the notorious plan for avoiding floods by affording near its mouth an additional outlet for the waters of the river.

To one who has given no thought to the hydraulics of silt-bearing streams the plan seems simple and has therefore had some adherents. Its chief feature was the digging a canal somewhere near the city of New Orleans so as to divert a large part of the water into Lake Borgne, and thence by a shorter route to the Gulf of Mexico. It is said that it would immediately lower the flood line all the way up the river to Cairo, and that there never could be an overflow again.

The contention has been disapproved by every engineer who has ever investigated it; the absolute and obtuse fallacy of the proposition has been time and time again demonstrated; yet, like the fisherman's cork, it is forever bobbing up. It must not be forgotten that at one time the Mississippi had this very connection with the Gulf through Lake Borgne which it is proposed to give it, because formerly the waters of the Gulf covered the whole valley. By perfectly natural and easily understood processes the river severed this connection of its own volition, and built up its bank so as to shut off all communication with Lake Borgne. If the proposed canal should be now dug, the same processes would fill it up, and in a few years the Mississippi waters would all pursue their present course to the sea. If, however, such an outlet could be permanently maintained, there would simply be two rivers where now there is but one, and the two together would not be so effective as the one now is. This is because of the well-established law of silt-bearing streams which flow through a bed of their own making, that they can only make or maintain a bed commensurate with their volume.

If there should be permanently withdrawn from the Mississippi River one-half of its volume, but a few years would elapse before its bed would be diminished one-half. If its volume could be permanently increased, there would soon be a corresponding increase in the size of its bed. If, therefore, a permanent outlet should be established, the bed of the river below it would become smaller and smaller, until it was only sufficient for the diminished volume flowing through it. When this had come about the smaller bed thus created below the outlet would no more be able to carry off the excess of water which would seek it in times of flood than the whole river is now able to accommodate the excess of water which pours down it in times of flood. The consequence would be that overflows would come as frequently as before the outlet was made. Moreover, actual experience has shown that such an outlet would have no appreciable value in lowering the flood level above it. In 1890 a crevasse occurred at Nita, a short distance above New Orelans, which carried off 400,000 cubic feet of water per second, which was about one-third of the whole volume of the river. Yet only 60 miles above it not the slightest effect from it could be observed.

Other theorists insist that the great bends should be cut through and the river straightened, so that the water might go unimpeded to the ocean. Those who champion this plan overlook the fact that the great bars of the river are necessary to its salvation if it is to be used for commercial purposes. They constitute dams which hold back the water, and are absolutely essential to the river if it is to be maintained for commercial uses. If the river could be straightened, these bars would be destroyed, the river would empty itself, and there would be nothing left. The engineering purpose has been not to destroy the bars, but merely to secure through them a sufficient channel through which water craft could pass, leaving the greater part of them intact to perform their proper function of damming the water and holding it back.

Those who advocate this method ought also to keep in mind the history of this river and the laws that govern its currents, which will persist, in spite of the efforts of man to change them. When a great bend 15 or 20 miles around is suddenly cut through at its base, the slope through the cut is so extreme that the water rushes through with prodigious force. It immediately undertakes to recover its natural and gentler slope. It can only do this by regaining the length lost by the cut through the bend, and to do this it must attack its banks, and by tearing them down prolong the bends above and below. Thus tremendous caving is precipitated by such a cut-off, which goes on until the river has regained its natural slope, and this can not be until it has recovered its lost length. From all this it results that not many years elapse after such a cut-off has been made before the river is as long as ever, and again sweeping on in majestic curves. Mark Twain, in his most interesting book describing life on the Mississippi in the early days, gives the cut-offs made from time to time between New Orleans and St. Louis, and the apparent shortening of the river thereby, and shows that if the river was really curtailed in length the city of New Orleans was brought so close to St. Louis as almost to be one of its suburbs. As a matter of fact, notwithstanding the many cut-offs of the past, the river measures as many miles to-day as it ever did.

Then, Mr. Chairman, we have had the reservoir plan, and it is perfectly astonishing how that has lingered in the minds of men. The idea of constructing reservoirs sufficient to hold back the gigantic floods that sweep to the ocean! In 1897 there passed the city of Cairo, which is at the junction of the Ohio and the Mississippi rivers, the almost incredible quantity of 1,500,000 cubic feet of water per second. Can you conceive of reservoirs which would hold back that or any material part of it? But that is not all. The floods which bring destruction to the dwellers of the lower valley do not come from the head waters of the Missouri. They do not come from the head waters of the Mississippi. This has been demonstrated over and over again. In 1897 by actual measurement 76 per cent of the 1,500,000 cubic feet of water which flowed by the city of Cairo came out of the Ohio River alone. That is the source of the floods which give so much trouble and bring so much destruction and devastation.

The floods that come out of the Missouri River have no appreciable effect on the flood situation of the lower valley; they come at a time when the danger of overflow has gone. They usually appear in May or June, when what is regarded as the overflow season is over. So it is with the flood waters of the Upper Mississippi. They have no effect except at times to prolong somewhat the flood condition produced by the waters of the Ohio.

I have in my hand a page taken from a paper called the National Advocate, which is headed "Heavy Government appropriations," which I will read:

Millions and millions of dollars have been appropriated by the Federal Government for the building of these levees and other constructions intended to protect the surrounding country from floods, and millions more must be appropriated by every Congress to come unless other steps are taken to prevent these floods. These measures of the Government are merely palliative; they do not go to the root of the evil. The report of Capt. Hiram Chittenden, of the Government Engineer Corps, however, shows that there is a way to strike at the trouble itself and largely prevent the floods instead of trying to inclose them between banks after they have become such.

He shows in his official reports that by the building of a series of great storage reservoirs at the head waters of the Missouri floods can be prevented through the diverting of the excess of waters into these artificial lakes. Surely this is something for Congress to give its attention to. Here is a practical plan. An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. Congress will go ahead appropriating millions every session for flood prevention without a question, but it will not appropriate the same amount for a plan which, according to the Government's own engineers, promises far greater results. Of course the damming of these natural reservoir sites would mean the reclamation of large tracts of land to irrigation, but this need not worry Congress, even its Eastern members, for the Eastern merchants are already alive to the situation and realize that the reclamation of the arid West would open to them the finest market in the world.

I will take occasion to say that I do not believe that Captain Chittenden ever made such a statement. I do not believe that Captain Chittenden or any other student of the subject, has ever stated, or ever will state, that the people of the Mississippi Valley would be protected from overflows if the Missouri River could be literally blotted from the map, much less if its head waters should be stored.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman from Mississippi allow an interruption?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. I asked the gentleman a moment ago if, in his opinion, the levees were a permanent aid to navigation.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I am coming to that question; I am not going to evade it.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman allow a further question?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman consider the construction of the levees as a permanent protection against floods? As a matter of fact, as the levees are built higher and higher, does not the building of them necessitate the further raising of them?

Mr. CATCHINGS. I suppose I might as well come to that now. I assure my friend that it had been my purpose to discuss all these questions.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not wish to hurry the gentleman.

Mr. CATCHINGS. That leads me to take up another proposition, which has also flown all over the continent and found lodgment, I may say, to some extent everywhere; that is, that the construction of levees has had the effect of raising the bed of the Mississippi River. The contention is that as levees are built the bed of the river rises, and that as the same quantity of water must pass through the channel in order to accommodate it and prevent floods, the levees must be made higher and higher. Do I correctly interpret the thought of my good friend?

Mr. MONDELL. You do.

Mr. CATCHINGS. This proposition has been investigated, examined, and reported upon many times. The Mississippi River Commission is composed of very distinguished and eminent men, all of whom, I am happy to believe, are my personal friends. The president is Gen. George L. Gillespie. Another member is Col. Amos Stickney; another, Maj. Thomas H. Handbury. These three are among the most accomplished engineers of the Army. Mr. H. L. Marinden, of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, is another member. Maj. B. M. Harrod, of New Orleans, who ranks among the eminent engineers of the country, is another. Still another is Mr. J. A. Ockerson, of St. Louis, who has been connected with the work of the commission since its organization, and has recently been appointed to it. His professional ability is universally admitted. Last, but by no means least, there is Hon. R. S. Taylor, of Indiana, one of the ablest men I ever met, and who, in my judgment, is of the very salt of the earth.

These gentlemen have made the most elaborate inquiry. They have had cross-section measurements made of all parts of the river, and have recently testified that there is not the slightest evidence that levee building has produced a raising of the river beds. Professional opinion is that the levees produce a contrary effect. For instance, one of the members of the commission, in February, 1898, made this statement to the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Commerce which was appointed to investigate the works upon the river:

> If you complete your levee system so as to confine your flood discharge to the channel you get a more effective agency in the work of scour. The river at its flood makes a bigger path for itself than it would if it were not restrained. A considerable deposit of sediment in the river is avoided, and the channel keeps larger and keeps open better.

Again he stated:

> The plan of the commission originally reported to Congress contemplated the restraint of the floods as one of the means for improving the channel for navigation. It was considered that as the Mississippi River makes its own channel and must always continue to make it, and as it makes it by the sole agency of scour, it would do that work most effectively by being concentrated in the highest possible degree. The power of the river to scour its channel increases with its velocity, and it was considered to be as necessary for the final improvement of the channel to control the high-water discharge as to control the low-water discharge; and this, it was thought, could be done in no other way than by the extension of the levee system.

He further said:

> Through all the changes of its membership it was always the judgment of a majority of its members that the restraint of the floods was essential to a complete improvement of the channel for navigation.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. A moment ago the gentleman referred to the fact that the construction of the levees by the Government had necessitated further and increased construction by the riparian States, and I understood him to say that this was necessitated by the increases in the flood height——

Mr. CATCHINGS. That is true—certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. The increase of the flood height brought about by the construction of Government levees.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Yes, sir; together with construction by the people in cooperation with the Government.

Mr. MONDELL. Was not that an admission on the part of the gentleman that the levees, as a matter of fact, have raised the flood height; and inasmuch as the levees confine the stream instead of allowing it to spread over the country, depositing its silt as it spreads, what becomes of the silt that the river carries and must necessarily deposit if it is not deposited in the narrowed channel?

Mr. CATCHINGS. My friend must understand that there is a great difference between what is called the flood level and the low-water level. Of course if you confine the water and prevent its spreading over the great valley you increase the flood level—the height to which the water rises. But the low-water level remains exactly the same. There is an increase of the flood level without any rising whatever of the bed of the river.

Now, the gentleman asks what becomes of the sediment. Let me state to my friend that the disposal by the river of its detritus is one of the wonders of the world. When these times of great overflow come and there are no levees to confine the floods, they loiter and linger and saunter along like a lazy man, so that a wave-crest will take weeks to pass from Cairo to the Gulf; whereas it will go down in ten days if the spur is put to it and it is compelled to travel through a decent and civilized path created by confining the waters.

My friend also knows it to be a principle of hydraulics that the capacity of a stream to support and carry sediment depends entirely upon its velocity. When its velocity is increased, its ability to transport its sediment is also increased. When, therefore, the floods are confined, they take off tons and tons and tons of sediment which they would drop if not confined.

As to the amount of sediment which the river carries, let me make a statement—and this is one of the great difficulties with which we have to contend—for I do not propose to do now what I have never done here before. I do not propose to withhold anything bearing legitimately upon the discussion of this question. I believe my friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] will do me the credit of saying that I have always endeavored as best I could to discuss every suggestion or proposition, whether adverse or not, which could be advanced in connection with this subject. I shrink from nothing. Because it is my duty to do so, I am ready to meet in debate all who may take part in it, though knowing that at all times I run a serious risk of being unhorsed.

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman will allow me to say that the first departure of the gentleman from his almost universal rule I have noticed this morning. In his argument in opposition to the statement I made that concentration was the rule first adopted in the treatment of this river he has said nothing of the rectification of the banks in the interest of concentration. I ask the gentleman whether, as a matter of fact, the plan of the commission did not propose a uniform width of 4,000 feet for the river, and whether they did not spend many millions of dollars in the construction of a false bank for the purpose of concentrating the waters in conjunction with the levees that were being built?

Mr. CATCHINGS. I will answer my good friend by saying that my criticism of what he had said related to his remarks concerning the improvement which was made by Captain Eads at the South Pass of the Mississippi River. I understood my friend to say that the policy was then to close the other mouths of the river and force all the water to go through the South Pass. I undertook to tell him that. As a matter of fact no such effort was ever made; nor was it ever expected that by any construction that might be made more than 10 per cent of the volume of the river would be compelled to go through the South Pass. I endeavored to show him that it was impossible to force a larger volume through that mouth without destroying the works themselves.

It is true, as my friend has suggested, that in the early days of this work there was an effort to revet the banks of the Mississippi River; but this revetment was no part of a concentration policy. Its object was to prevent the enormous caving constantly occurring, thus increasing the sediment which the river must transport, and which when dropped occasions the great bars which make so much trouble to navigation. The idea of the commission was that if the banks could be held in place by revetment and the river by that means compelled at all stages to travel over the same path, under the principle that in time water will wear away a rock, the river would be forced to scour out and lower its bed. That was the whole policy of the revetment system, which was quite largely entered into at the inception of this work. And it is true to-day as an engineering proposition, it is absolutely correct, and I have no criticism whatever to pass upon the Mississippi River Commission in this respect.

I say now that their engineering theory was absolutely sound; that if the banks of that river could be made permanent, and by that means it could be compelled from one end of the year to the other to travel over precisely the same path, there would be a wearing away of the bottom which would eventually so lower it as largely to dispense with the necessity for levees and make overflows practically impossible.

They have computed that 9½ acres, 66 feet deep, for every mile of the Mississippi River are annually destroyed by caving between Cairo and Donaldsonville. Under another method of computation that amounts to 10 square miles, 86 feet deep, each year. Such is the load which the river has to pack. It was hoped by revetting the banks and preventing this enormous caving the river could be relieved of this prodigious burden, which fatigues even that giant stream and sometimes causes it to lay its load down in despair. That was the purpose of the revetment work.

Associated with it was the purpose to narrow the river where its width is excessive to about 3,000 feet, which is regarded as its natural width. That was to be done not by revetment, but by contraction works, known as "permeable dams," which, while admitting the passage of the water, yet sufficiently checked its velocity to compel it to drop its sediment and thus build up new or artificial banks. These contraction works were entirely successful in this respect, but, unfortunately, when the river was thus taken by the throat and held up, so to speak, by these protection works on one side, it immediately avenged itself by tearing down its banks on the opposite side. It thus became necessary to revet the opposite bank in order to maintain the conditions established by the contraction works. But it became manifest after some years of experiment that this class of work was too costly, that the Government could not afford to do it, and that even if it could it was not likely to do it. I believe the estimate was that it would cost something like $134,000,000 to effect this kind of bank protection as far down as the mouth of the Red River. I may be in error as to the amount, but it was something enormous. What I am now discussing is the system of permanent improvement originally entered upon.

Now, the commission have abandoned that, not because from an engineering standpoint it was in the least degree incorrect, but because of its great costliness. Moreover, commerce, which was crying out loudly for relief, was not content in any view of the question to await the inevitably slow progress of this permanent improvement. Therefore revetment as a principal feature of the work has been discarded. It is now employed to a limited extent for the purpose of protecting commercial centers, such as New Orleans, Memphis, Greeneville, Natchez, Helena, and other similar places where it is essential that there should be some permanency; and to prevent the making of cut-offs, which, as I have hitherto explained, work so much destruction both above and below them; and to protect important levees, as, for instance, at Lake Bolivar, Lake Providence, and Kempe Landing, which if destroyed by caving could only be replaced at enormous cost. At such points it is manifest wisdom to preserve existing levees by revetment.

With these exceptions it may be fairly said that revetment no longer constitute a part of the ordinary plans of the Mississippi River Commission. For the purpose of annually giving temporary relief to low-water navigation they now make extensive use of hydraulic dredges. These hydraulic dredges are one of the marvels of the century, and the Mississippi River Commission to a very great extent have been pioneers in their construction and operation upon a comprehensive and extended scale. Every dollar which the Government has expended in connection with their whole work would have been well spent if they had done nothing more than demonstrate by their experiments the marvelous capability of the hydraulic dredge.

They sent the drawings and designs of some of their dredges to the Paris Exposition, which took the gold premium, or whatever the first premium was called. There they were examined and studied by professional men from everywhere. Mr. Lynden Bates, who constructed their first great hydraulic dredge, has recently built one for the Russian Government for use on the river Volga, which is the largest in the world and has the capacity to remove something like 5,000 cubic yards per hour. These dredges are used in the low-water season for the purpose of cutting out a channel through the bars. The work is temporary, of course. These channels are destroyed when the high water comes, when they are filled up with silt, but they are easily renewed; so that the expense which, as I say, hitherto attended this work will very largely decrease. The revetment work having been largely abandoned, the contraction work being used now to a very limited extent, and there being nothing except the maintenance of the levee system for the control of floods, the construction and operation of hydraulic dredges to ameliorate conditions in times of low water, and the protection of a limited number of localities, the ultimate cost of the work of improvement will be greatly less than originally estimated.

Mr. Chairman, the work of levee building has not been done in the dark. My friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], who always assails this project, will persist in overlooking the very language of the law under which the work is progressing. He will insist and persist from morning until noon, from noon till night, and I suppose he insists and persists in his dreams, so that it is the first thing that enters that active and marvelous brain of his when he arises in the morning that there is no necessity for improvement of the navigation of the river in times of flood, because there is ample water. Now, the very language of the law requires that the Mississippi River Commission shall prepare and prescribe such plans as shall best improve the navigation and promote the interests of commerce at all stages of the river. My friend shuts his eyes when he comes to those words and always endeavors to confine the debate to the narrow point of the capacity of the river in times of flood to float a steamboat.

Well, now, Mr. Chairman, does it not promote the interests of commerce to construct these levees and preserve that magnificent domain from the floods, and is the benefit thereby conferred merely local? While those who own the plantations in the Mississippi Valley are primarily benefited by this levee construction, ultimately many others are benefited as well. Proverbially, like all planters, they save no great sum over and above their ordinary necessities and comforts, and in my district the people, God bless them, are generous and free-hearted, and what they earn is not put away in a miser's hoard, but speedily finds its way into the marts of commerce. There is not a city in this country, from Boston to the Gulf or to San Francisco, which does not find many of its most valuable purchasers in this great valley. The cities of Cairo, Memphis, Vicksburg, Helena, Greenville, Natchez, Baton Rouge, and the great cities of St. Louis and New Orleans are all extensively engaged in traffic with its inhabitants.

These inhabitants produce little else than raw material. What they produce and sell constitutes a very large part of the exports of this country and helps to maintain the balance of trade. They make cotton and sugar and rice for sale, and practically nothing else. Their storehouses are kept in the West. They buy their mules and horses from those who raise them in the great Western States, their harness, plows, wagons, gin stands, and farming implements generally, their clothing, and all that they wear and consume. All of these things, for which they pay millions of dollars, they buy from the great cities all over this country.

Mr. Chairman, is it not a fact that every man who finds for what he has to sell a purchaser in the Mississippi Valley is interested in its protection?

Mr. RIDGELY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Yes; certainly.

Mr. RIDGELY. Are not these arguments of yours and these facts, in which I agree with the gentleman, equally applicable to the people of the Missouri River Valley or any other stream whose inhabitants must be protected from overflows and destruction of their property? If that is a proper matter for public appropriation, would it not apply to the people similarly situated upon any stream?

Mr. CATCHINGS. I do not wish to discuss the Missouri River question, but assuming what I believe to be the case, that the gentleman has in mind the protection of property on that river from caving, I will say that the people in the Mississippi Valley have never asked or expected the Government to expend one dollar of money for the purpose of preventing their plantations and property from caving into the river. Caving goes on constantly at the enormous rate which I have hitherto described, but it has not occurred to the people of that valley, and I think it never will occur to them, that the Government ought to take money out of its Treasury and revet its banks for the purpose of keeping their plantations from caving in.

Mr. RUCKER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Yes, sir.

Mr. RUCKER. Have not the riparious owners on the Missouri River as much right to have their property prevented from caving by protecting its banks as the people on the Mississippi to have their property protected from overflow by means of levees?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Chairman, I have not said that the Government has appropriated money to be used in the construction of levees for the purpose of protecting property from the losses occasioned by overflow. On the contrary, I affirm that the expenditure has been made for the purpose of aiding the navigability of the river, and especially at high-water stages, when otherwise a great portion of the valley would be inundated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Mississippi may have time in which to conclude his remarks.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I want to say further, Mr. Chairman, in response to the gentleman from Missouri, that I do not want to be put in the attitude of now criticising the plans of my good friends along the Missouri River. There are 32,000 square miles of fertile lands in the Mississippi Valley subject to inundation. In a period of overflow it is converted into a vast sea 40 to 60 miles wide, and all commerce and traffic with other sections of the country is for the time absolutely terminated. The great coal fleets which come out of the Ohio, bearing millions of tons for consumers, must be held back, because they can not go down in safety, and can find no place in which they can be unloaded, and no persons to whom the coal can be sold.

Every steamboat is tied to the banks, and there is an absolute dearth of business throughout the valley. So that when we protect it from overflow by means of levees we promote the interests of commerce, we help to create and maintain it, and we provide safety and facilities for the vehicles by which it is carried on. That valley is traversed by great railroads engaged in interstate commerce. Hundreds of millions of tons of freight from all parts of the country going to all parts of the country pass through and across it by means of these great interstate railways. When the floods come, this important and necessary traffic is seriously interrupted. Is it not worth while, by affording protection, to encourage the use for the purposes of interstate commerce of this great natural route for railways? The president of the Illinois Central Railroad has stated that his road going down through this valley was interrupted by the floods in 1897 for nearly two months, and that it sustained damages exceeding half a million dollars.

I mention that as but one illustration out of many which I might have hunted up and produced.

So, Mr. Chairman, gentlemen may talk of this work as they please. I say there is no money which this Government has expended, and none that it is likely to expend, which will create and maintain a greater volume of commerce. I say that there is no other purpose for which money can be expended which would bring so much of joy and comfort to such a multitude of our citizens.

The people of my district—and when I speak of them I describe all the dwellers in the valley—are like that splendid body of men we know as the pioneers of the West. They have been accustomed to contend with the great and mighty forces of nature. They are of true heroic mold. They have been ever dauntless and courageous in the presence of the perpetual menace to their welfare and safety. This high courage and resolution, I am proud to say, have descended from father to son. When the Spanish war came upon us, although in my Congressional district there are fewer white men than in any other, and with no idle classes to draw from, nearly five full companies of splendid young men immediately sped to the front. It was not their destiny to participate in combat with the foe; but if it had been so ordered they would have given abundant proof that, in the language of Prince Bismarck, one of the most stupendous figures of modern times, "they fear God and nothing else." It is in behalf of such people, sir, that I make my plea.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman permit me an interruption?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. I am in full sympathy with the gentleman from Mississippi in this matter. I believe that the building of the levees along the Lower Mississippi by the General Government is entirely proper, even though the construction of the levees protect private property and perform no other service; and I shall vote for the bill when it comes to a vote, partially because it contains this item and because it protects the land of the constituents of the gentleman from Mississippi. But I wish to ask the gentleman if, when an amendment is offered which will perform partly the same service for my constituents which are performed here for his indirectly, when by an amendment we aid navigation and at the same time aid indirectly irrigation, he will not vote with us on that proposition?

Mr. CATCHINGS. If my friend can satisfy me that there are rivers in the arid region which are capable of bearing commerce, and which are likely to bear commerce; that steamboat lines are likely to be established for transporting commerce upon them, I should not object, unquestionably, to furnishing them a supply of water by means of reservoirs. But my friend must not misunderstand me. I want to be frank. If he proposes to secure the storage of water to use for irrigation I could not vote for it, because it would not be germane to this bill.

Mr. MONDELL. The amendment which I propose and which I have in mind is primarily in the interest of navigation, but indirectly it will enable the people of that region to irrigate the arid land.

Mr. CATCHINGS. If my friend could satisfy me of that I have no objection to it; but I should want to carefully consider whether any stream to be used in irrigating arid lands would be capable of bearing commerce.

Mr. Chairman, I have already too long trespassed on the time of the committee, I am sure, but before I take my seat I feel it to be incumbent upon me to take some notice of an attack that was made upon me by a carefully prepared article published on the 6th day of July, 1898, in a newspaper called the Vicksburg Dispatch, by a gentleman who has since been elected my successor.

I take notice of this because my friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] made such use of it in his speech that I can not remain silent. He quoted from it the charge that, because of dereliction of duty on my part, only about $2,000,000 of the sum appropriated by Congress had at that date been set apart to levee construction in my district since I became a Representative; and the further charge that, because of similar dereliction on my part, certain rivers in my State, which I shall name later on, had been neglected. These charges against me have thus been repeated in the presence of my colleagues here, and have been perpetuated in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. No just man can complain if I defend myself in the same presence and likewise perpetuate my defense in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Before making specific reply, and in order that my defense may be better understood, I desire to invite attention to the fact that all appropriations that have been made for the Lower Mississippi have been granted in general terms and with full latitude to the Mississippi River Commission to disburse and expend them as they might deem best, having in view the purpose of Congress in making them. Some of the money thus placed at their disposal they have expended in constructing revetments and other channel works at Plum Point and elsewhere. Some of it has been expended in the construction and operation of dredge boats. Some of it has gone into the construction of levees; some has gone for other purposes. On page 4550 of volume 7 of the Report of the Chief of Engineers for 1900 will be found a consolidated statement of all their expenditures. As to all expenditures they have full latitude.

Now, I have always entertained the opinion that I had discharged my full duty when I had taken my part in securing these general appropriations from Congress. I have always attended the meetings of the Mississippi River Commission because I have acquired much information and benefit and profit from my intercourse with its members, but I never, either in public meeting or private conversation, requested them to allot a single dollar of this money for my district. I have had such high regard for these distinguished officers that I have felt that it would be both idle and improper for me to attempt, by solicitation or otherwise, to control their action in the matter of disbursements to be made by them.

This publication, which was designed to array the people of my district against me, makes the statement that at its date the Congressional district which I have the honor to represent had received at the hands of the Mississippi River Commission since I became a Representative only $1,824,433.22. As I propose to dispute this statement, I shall publish with my remarks the whole article, so that its author may have the same detailed hearing before this magnificent tribunal that I propose to have myself. This is just to both him and me. Now, while I have not, for the reasons already given, solicited the Mississippi River Commission to make specific allotments for my district, I propose to show how grossly inaccurate the figures of my assailant are. I dispute the statement which my friend from Iowa put into the RECORD for the purpose, in part, of vindicating the Mississippi River Commission itself from what would otherwise have seemed to be a very gross discrimination against the citizens of my district.

Now, there were actually expended by the United States from 1882 to April 30, 1900, as is shown by the report of the Mississippi River Commission, on page 4536 of the report of the Chief of Engineers for 1900, which I have on my desk, and which bears date June 30, 1900, the sum of $15,193,050.21, distributed as follows:

Upper St. Francis district	$19,091.22
Lower St. Francis district	610,393.95
White River district	1,121,257.08
Upper Yazoo district	1,055,105.93
Lower Yazoo district	2,792,834.95
Upper Tensas district	3,946,710.56
Lower Tensas district	2,295,583.84
Atchafalaya district	1,290,643.08
Lafourche district	487,070.91
Barataria district	311,660.04
Pontchartrain district	992,583.08
Lake Borgne district	269,515.57
Total	15,193,050.21

From the appropriation of two millions and a quarter carried by the sundry civil bill of June 6, 1900, which have been largely thought not wholly expended (I refer to page 4526 of the same report), $1,065,500 were allotted to be expended for levees, as follows:

Upper St. Francis district	$20,000
Lower St. Francis district	114,500
White River district	50,000
Upper Yazoo district	94,000
Lower Yazoo district	150,000
Upper Tensas district	300,000
Lower Tensas district	110,000
Atchafalaya district	55,000
Lafourche district	28,000
Barataria district	14,000
Pontchartrain district	50,000
Lake Borgne district	80,000
Total	1,065,500

This makes the amounts expended and allotted as follows:

Upper St. Francis district	$39,691.22
Lower St. Francis district	724,893.95
White River district	1,171,257.08
Upper Yazoo district	1,149,105.93
Lower Yazoo district	2,942,834.95
Upper Tensas district	4,246,710.56
Lower Tensas district	2,405,583.84
Atchafalaya district	1,345,643.08
Lafourche district	515,070.91
Barataria district	325,660.04
Pontchartrain district	1,042,583.08
Lake Borgne district	349,515.57
Total	16,258,550.21

These figures show that the levee commissioners of my district have received the sum of $4,091,940.88.

The said attack upon me states that $445,825.45 had been given them before my service here began. Deduct this from the aggregate above stated and there remains the sum of $3,646,115.43 received by them from the United States since my first term began.

The attack upon me, which bears date July 6, 1898, charges that at that time the total sum expended by the United States on Mississippi levees since I became a member of this House was $1,824,433.22. If this be true, then, between July 6, 1898, and June 30, 1900, the date to which I have computed levee expenditures and allotments, the Mississippi River Commission must have set apart to Mississippi levees the difference between that sum and $3,646,115.43, or, say, $1,821,682.21, and this every man in the district knows is preposterous. This shows the gross inaccuracy of the figures used in the attack upon me.

But this is not all. The commission have expended $145,000 in revetting the bank at Lake Bolivar for the purpose of saving the large and costly levee at that point, which was about to cave into the river. If it had not done so, the levee line would have had to go around the lake at an enormous cost. So the commission have prevented by revetment at a cost of $449,269.40 the threatened cut-off at Ashbrook Neck, on the Arkansas side, between Arkansas City and Greenville. In their report of June 30, 1900, they say:

> At Ashbrook Neck a cut-off has been prevented which, if allowed, would have so changed the course of the river in the vicinity that two other cut-offs would have inevitably followed, together with an increase of caving and the destruction of a considerable part of the levee system of the Yazoo and Tensas basins.

At least one-half of this sum—say $224,634.70—should be added to the expenditures made by the United States to the levee builders in my district. Add this and the Lake Bolivar expenditure and we have altogether contributed for levee purposes in my district since I entered Congress $4,015,750.13.

There is still another item which must be considered in ascertaining how much assistance for levee purposes my district has received.

The Report of the Chief of Engineers for 1900, page 4825, shows that since my service began $843,418.02 have been expended in protecting the banks in the Greenville Bend. The Mississippi River Commission, in their report of July 1, 1899, say:

> It has for its object the rectification of the banks to prevent the encroachment of the river upon the town of Greenville, Miss., and also to prevent the destruction of the controlling levee line which protects the Yazoo Basin from overflow.

Let us see, now, how the case stands if the basis of mileage be adopted. I allude to this because the author of this attack attempts to take up the question from the standpoint of mileage.

The commission, in their report of June 30, 1900, say that the levees, as they now stand, are "over 1,300 miles long." The Mississippi levees are 310 miles long, or less than one-fourth of the whole. The total expenditures and allotments for levees, as already shown, amount to $16,258,550.21. Of this Mississippi has received for levee building $4,091,940.88, or more than one-fourth of the sum expended and allotted for the entire river.

If the mileage basis be adopted as to those expenditures and allotments only which have been made since I became a Representative, it will stand thus: I have shown that $16,258,550.21 have been expended and allotted for the whole river. The article attacking me says that $1,778,695.36 had been expended before my entrance here. Deduct that and we have left $14,479,854.85. One-fourth of this is $3,619,963.71. The Mississippi levees are less than one-fourth of the whole in length, and yet they have received $3,646,115.43, or more than one-fourth of the aggregate expended for levees since my service here began.

These figures, which are taken from the last report of the commission, show how easily simple facts, plainly stated, can put down an unwarranted and unprovoked attack.

But, Mr. Chairman, since, in justice to the gentleman who made this attack I give him the full benefit of his argument, which was evidently prepared with great care and elaboration, by publishing it in the RECORD, it becomes necessary that I should make reply to other charges contained therein than those specifically adverted to by the gentleman from Iowa. They will be read by my associates here and wherever the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD goes, and if I should fail to meet them here and now my silence might, and most likely would, be construed into a confession that they are justified. My distinguished friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] was kind enough to say that I have done more for the cause of the Mississippi River and in securing levee contributions from the Government than any other gentleman in the House, and he also stated that in season and out of season I have devoted myself to this work. I am quoting him from memory, but I have given, I think, the substance of what he said. I greatly value his kind and complimentary expressions, but it becomes my duty to inform him that he has been laboring under a delusion; that I have been a "truant;" that I have had no part whatever in upholding the work; that I have done nothing toward securing appropriations, and that the Senators and other Representatives from the valley States have likewise done nothing in this regard.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman from Mississippi allow an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. I hope the gentleman from Mississippi did not suppose that I was endeavoring to aid in any attack that had been made upon him.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I understand that, but I am none the less called upon, I think, to meet the attack from which my distinguished friend quoted. Having stated to my friend that neither myself nor any other Representative in Congress has been of influence in securing these appropriations, I will explain to him how they came to be made by reading further from this attack upon me.

The article says:

> When speaking to you [meaning thereby the people of my Congressional district] on the subject of appropriations for levees and the Mississippi River, I have divided the periods before and after 1890. It was that year the great and disastrous flood caused all the country to stop and fix their attention on our needs. It was that year all commercial bodies and organized associations passed resolutions calling on the Government to give us aid. It was that year the river interests held a convention in Vicksburg and sent a delegation to Washington to lobby for an appropriation for levees, and that year marks the beginning of the increase in money for the levees, and yet General CATCHINGS had already been a member of Congress six years.
> It was the united efforts of allied interests, railroads, etc., that made the expenditure for levees thereafter more than twice what it was before. General CATCHINGS did not bring about the increase, and if his friends claim that he did, it lies with them to show why he shall not be held responsible for the Government policy which has piled up debts on his district, and that you all know is a fact.

So my friend [Mr. HEPBURN] will see that he has all these long years been laboring under a gross delusion, and that my learned colleagues from Arkansas and Louisiana and Mississippi and Tennessee, and myself and the Senators at the other end of this Capitol have had nothing to do with it, but that these appropriations have all been secured through the efforts of the railroads and "allied interests," whatever they are.

This chipper assertion that outside influences have secured these appropriations brings to my mind a cognate assertion from another source, with regard to the sundry civil bill of June 6, 1900, which carried an appropriation for the Lower Mississippi River of $2,250,000. A gentleman from my district, Mr. Fred. Clark, who is a fine lawyer and a most excellent citizen, came on here while that bill was pending in the Senate to urge that an appropriation be added to it. It was added, and when the bill came back here the House agreed to it. This was all done in pursuance of the plans of the Congressional friends of the river, which had been formed long before he came here.

Yet I am reliably advised that there are persons in my district who are silly enough to believe or malicious enough to say that the $2,250,000 were appropriated as the result of influence exerted by Mr. Clark. Now, there is not a gentleman here who does not know that Mr. Clark's influence was no more felt than a fly would be on the tusk of an elephant. If the time shall ever come when the people of the Mississippi Valley are driven to rely upon such so-called outside influence to secure assistance from the Government, they will find that their great cause has already received its deathblow.

A further perusal of the article from which my friend from Iowa quoted, and which he has since placed in my hands, will show that the attack upon me is far more radical than a mere criticism of me for not procuring what its author seems to think he could have obtained and what I ought to have obtained in the way of levee contributions from the Mississippi River Commission, for in another paragraph he says:

> And I will tell you that I do not believe any man knows what a completo levee system from Cairo to the Gulf would cost.

That statement is made in the teeth of the averment by the members of the Mississippi River Commission, which I know to be concurred in by all engineers who have ever investigated the subject, that such a system can be completed for $20,000,000. I am but a layman myself, Mr. Chairman. I am but an humble groper in the dark. I simply follow, in my plain and modest way, when I undertake to discuss the engineering problems involved, the path which has been blazoned out by the distinguished officials placed by the Government in charge of this work, and what they advocate I advocate, and what they condemn I condemn. But while this is so, if I really believed that they are wrong, and that no man knows what a levee system would cost, I should not feel justified in asking for further appropriations.

But this is not all. The article proceeds:

> And it is not to your interest for the Government to attempt to build it at this time unless it will finish your part first.

Suppose that I could have brought myself to the advocacy of so extraordinary a proposition and that when we came to deal with the Mississippi River in the River and Harbor Committee room I had said to the members of the committee: "I want you to put a proviso on this appropriation requiring the Mississippi River Commission first to complete the levees on the Mississippi side before it expends a dollar in the States of Missouri, Arkansas, Louisiana, or Tennessee." And suppose that the River and Harbor Committee, through some inconceivable process of reasoning, had sanctioned the suggestion and reported its bill to the House with such a proviso. Does not every gentleman here know that all of my good and honored friends from those States whose alluvial lands are just as much entitled to protection as those in Mississippi would have leaped upon my back like a pack of wild-cats and torn me to pieces in the hundredth part of a second? Does not every gentleman here know that such a proposition would be rejected by this House by a unanimous vote? The whole assault upon me, and this suggestion in particular, ignores the fact that the object of these appropriations has largely been to effect the general improvement of the river in the interests of commerce and proceeds wholly upon the idea that they have been made solely for the prevention of overflows.

The Mississippi River Commission was neither expected nor required by Congress to make an equal division of money among the several levee districts, and upon such a theory no appropriations at all could have been obtained.

The attack proceeds as follows:

> But they—
>
> Meaning my friends—
> say send him back to Congress and let him finish it. Finish what? The mortgaging and destruction of the Yazoo Delta? I think it is time to change the plan and policy of the Government aid.

So you see, my friend from Iowa, that the attack is radical and far-reaching. Gentlemen will perceive that this is not merely a criticism of my supposed dereliction in getting allotments of money for my district from the Mississippi River Commission, but that an assault is made upon the whole method and policy which I have thought it wise to pursue. A change of plan and policy is demanded, which of course can only be effected by legislation. What legislation should be enacted to accomplish this change is not stated, but of course Congress will be advised of this in time. But we know that it is to be radical enough to overthrow the plan and policy which have hitherto been pursued.

The article proceeds:

> General CATCHINGS is in Congress to-day without a party to which he can claim to belong, to which he can turn to ask for aid in that matter, and he is estopped from calling on the Government to right the wrong done by a policy he has been advocating.

I have been laboring under the impression that I am a Democrat. [Laughter.] I know that I am not a Republican, and I do not think that my good friends, the Populists, claim me as belonging to their band; but here I am informed, and you are informed for the first time, that I belong to no political party.

For a political orphan I have done fairly well, for I have received uniform courtesy and generous consideration from substantially the entire membership of the House, and I now beg to express my grateful acknowledgments therefor.

The assault upon me is continued, as follows:

> But I must invite your attention to the record of appropriations for rivers within the Third Congressional district. It is shown by the reports of the Chief of Engineers that at the time General CATCHINGS went to Congress the following rivers were being improved: Yazoo, Big Sunflower, Tallahatchie, Coldwater, Yalobusha, Tchula Lake, and Steeles Bayou, and that $262,500 had been appropriated in eleven years preceding. Since he went to Congress all improvement has stopped on the four last, and in the fourteen years $232,000 was appropriated. Yet the amount expended for river and harbor works has increased enormously. Neither can he take refuge behind the engineers in this by claiming adverse recommendation, because the full amount of money asked for has almost never been given, and in the report for 1898, page 1363, the engineers asked for $6,000 for Yalobusha and never have gotten 1 cent. In the report for page —— he asked for a survey of Big Sunflower and the Yazoo systems, so as to make a plan for locks and dams, saying the river never had had enough money spent on it; yet no money has ever been given.

As to the Yalobusha River. This river is a matter of no earthly consequence to the people of my district, and not one of them have ever mentioned it to me. In the report of the Chief of Engineers for 1885, page 1520, the sum of $5,000 was asked for it, although more than the original estimate had then been exceeded. In 1886, page 1474, Report Chief of Engineers, $6,000 was asked for. The same sum was asked for in the Chief's report for 1887-88, page 1474. It was stated that five or six months' navigation was already secured, but that "no steamboats ply in this stream at present and the commerce amounts to little or nothing." The same report was made in 1888. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors did not regard the stream as worthy of further improvement, as it had no commerce. I so stated to Senator Walthall, whose home county was chiefly concerned, and he fully concurred in that opinion, and at his suggestion I allowed it to go by without objection. Further appropriations under conditions as they were then reported to be would have been wholly unjustifiable. Tchula Lake and Steeles Bayou were appropriated for until the estimates for them were exhausted. As to Coldwater, the report was adverse. On page 1519, Chief's report for 1885, it is said:

> No further appropriation is asked for this improvement. The river is only navigable during the highest stages of water in the Yazoo and Tallahatchie rivers, and then navigation is good and about as safe as that of the latter. To secure safe navigation at lower stages would require a greater expenditure than the commerce of the country would warrant.

The Yazoo, the Big Sunflower, and the Tallahatchie have received the customary percentage of the estimates for them.

As to the criticism that I have not secured an appropriation of $50,000 for a survey of the Big Sunflower and Yazoo systems, I will say that the author of this attack talks about it as if it were a mere bagatelle that a child might get for the asking. I do not know what my good friend the honored chairman of my committee [Mr. BURTON] would say if I should suggest that he allow me $50,000 simply for the purpose of making an experimental survey of these streams, to ascertain if they could be improved, perchance, by a costly system of locks and dams. The author of this attack will, of course, in due time make up for my dereliction in this matter by securing the $50,000 needed for the survey.

Now, the older members of this committee will remember—my friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] I know will, because he assailed me quite vigorously in connection with it—that I secured in the bill of 1896 a provision placing under what we call the continuing-contract system the work for the diversion of the mouth of the Yazoo River in order to restore the Vicksburg Harbor. I do not just now recall the cost of the project, but it was something over a million dollars. That work was held up by the Secretary of War, along with other contract works in that bill, for some considerable time. I only got it released, so to speak, on the 2d day of February, 1898. That is, on that day I got the permission of the Secretary of War for the engineer in charge to proceed. From some cause, as to which I have no information, the engineer in charge did not advertise for proposals until about June, 1899, nearly eighteen months after he had permission to proceed. Now, the author of this attack charges me with having the work delayed for the purpose of inducing my constituents to believe that it was essential that I should be returned to Congress in order to secure its prosecution. He says:

> He has simply held back this work as a club to beat you into returning him to Congress.

I am quite sure that it is not necessary for me to say to Representatives here who have served with me and who are familiar with the manner in which I discharge my public duties that I am incapable of so scurvy a trick. As a matter of fact, I never approached the engineer in charge with a view to hastening his action, because I had enough regard for him to feel that he would have resented it just as I would resent any interference by an engineer with my official work. I supposed that in his good time, when he had prepared his plans and got them ready, he would proceed with the work. That is the whole of it, so far as I am concerned. It is obvious, however, that I could not have delayed the work without the unscrupulous cooperation of the Secretary of War, the Chief of Engineers, or the engineer in charge, or all of them.

The attack upon me continues:

> But in truth, if he had attended to this contract and had the work done as he should, he would have been left without any excuse for asking the free silver people of Warren County to send a pinchbeck gold bug to Congress. He has simply held back this work as a club to beat you into returning him to Congress. There is only one other explanation that can be offered—he is utterly without influence in Washington City.

I do not know that it is a thing to pride myself upon at all, but I had thought that I was a gold bug of the pure and unadulterated sort; yet it seems that in this respect, as in all others, I am merely pinchbeck. I am not only charged with having for selfish, political purposes delayed the work after it had been authorized, but I am denied any credit whatever for its adoption by Congress. After some preliminary remarks, intended to show how the idea of the project originated, the attack proceeds:

> Major Willard—
> Meaning the local engineer—
> and Hon. L. W. Magruder went to Washington City in February, 1892, and explained the real status of affairs to the River and Harbor Committee, and for these reasons the river and harbor act approved July 13, 1892, appropriated $75,000 for purchase and clearing right of way.

This was the beginning of a project to cost over a million dollars. Major Willard and Hon. L. W. Magruder explained it, "and for these reasons" it was adopted. Gentlemen here can get a valuable "pointer" from this. They have, I am sure, had the impression that a great deal of patient and persistent work was required at their hands to secure the adoption of such a costly project as this. They are now assured that they are mistaken in this, and that it is only necessary to bring on the local engineer and one of their citizens to explain things to the River and Harbor Committee and the matter is accomplished in the twinkling of an eye. And, of course, it was because Major Willard and Hon. L. W. Magruder explained things to them that in 1894 $225,000 was appropriated, and that in 1896 the project was placed among the most favored ones under the continuing-contract system, with authority for the expenditure of $860,000 more. The attack will be published with my remarks in full, and I trust that all gentlemen here will read it.

Mr. Chairman, I have already detained the committee far longer than I had any idea of doing. I thank them very much for the kind attention they have given me. If I have spoken at undue length, it has been for two reasons: First, I have had the work which has been my theme very much at heart; and, second, this is the last opportunity that I shall ever have to address such an audience as this in its behalf. I go out of Congress, as my good friends all know, on the 4th of March, and I felt that I could not deny myself the pleasure, for it is a pleasure, to raise my voice once more in behalf of the good people of my district, whose hearts are bound up in this great work. I now repeat that it is my honest judgment that this Government can do no work which will bring so much joy, so much blessing, so much benefit to so many people, and at the same time bring so much profit to the Government itself. [Loud applause.]

The attack commented upon is as follows:

LEVEE FACTS AND FIGURES—HON. PATRICK HENRY PROVES THAT CLAIMS MADE FOR CATCHINGS ARE FALSE.

I have appeared before you at various times and places within the last sixty days and have stated the facts concerning the much-vaunted services of your present Representative in Congress. I notified him by publication where and when I would show up his record, offering to divide time, but he has only appeared by proxy to enter his defense. Each time that a Goldbug has answered in his name and offered you glittering generalities I have pinned him down with the figures and scorched him with the fire of truth so not one has essayed a second fight.

When speaking to you on the subject of appropriations for levees and the Mississippi River, I have divided the periods before and after 1890. It was that year the great and disastrous flood caused all the country to stop and fix their attention on our needs. It was that year all commercial bodies and organized associations passed resolutions calling on the Government to give us aid. It was that year the river interests held a convention in Vicksburg and sent a delegation to Washington to lobby for an appropriation for levees, and that year marks the beginning of the increase in money for the levees, and yet General CATCHINGS had already been a member of Congress six years. It was the united effort of allied interests, railroads, etc., that made the expenditure for levees thereafter more than twice what it was before. General CATCHINGS did not bring about the increase, and if his friends claim he did it lies with them to show why he shall not be held responsible for the Government policy which has piled up debts on his district; and that you all know is a fact.

The only other champion who has offered to defend the truant is the Vicksburg Herald. Instead of sending a reporter to take down my words, if it desired to reply, it has tried to create the impression that it was answering me by talking about one thing when I said something about another. It has offered a lot of figures which it says were gotten together by great labor, and from the way they are mixed I think it was. It doubts if I have learned enough in so short a time as to be able to tell why they are wrong. I am not called on to set the Herald straight every time it wanders astray politically or otherwise, but as soon as I quit accepting what it said about levees or other matters it was not hard for me to learn the facts. This it can easily do if it will accept the official reports and quit trying to fit the figures to its own ends.

I am free to confess, though, that I was perfectly astonished at the cheek of General CATCHINGS's followers in proclaiming his championship of the river interests. You must understand that his reputation is based on his supposed knowledge of the river problem, as it is called, and he has made speeches upholding the plans of the Mississippi River Commission for revetting the banks and building levees to scour the river bed. The bank revetment has been declared a failure by the commission itself, after spending about $17,000,000, and the Herald of Sunday, July 3, says the bed doesn't scour, and that it is now known that it will yet cost more to finish the system than it was believed it would before any money was spent. And I will tell you that I don't believe any man knows what a complete levee system from Cairo to the Gulf would cost, and it is not to your interest for the Government to attempt to build it at this time unless it will finish your part first.

The report of the secretary of the Mississippi River Commission each year since 1885 gives a detailed account of all the expenditures from the beginning to date. I have taken the following from the report of the Chief of Engineers of the Army for 1885, pages 2932 and 2933, as the amounts expended for levees from March 3, 1881, to June 30, 1885:

Long Lake, Arkansas	$15,000.00
Yazoo Front, Mississippi	80,950.00
Opossum Fork, Arkansas	25,000.00
Yazoo Front, Mississippi	364,875.45
Tensas Front, Arkansas and Louisiana	411,107.74
Tensas Front, Louisiana	548,258.24
Atchafalaya Front, Louisiana	133,503.93
Total	1,778,695.36
The total appropriations for the Mississippi River	8,483,548.56

The above amount for levees had been spent before General CATCHINGS entered Congress. He was elected in 1884 and took his seat in December, 1885, and of that there had been spent in Mississippi $445,825.45, or a little over 25 per cent, or one-fourth of the whole.

In the report for 1897, which is the last that has been published, on page 3529 et seq., I find expended for levees to June 30, 1897—

Lower St. Francis district, Arkansas	$354,697.34
White River district, Arkansas	902,757.35
Upper Yazoo district, Mississippi	811,619.92
Upper Tensas district, Arkansas and Louisiana	3,088,731.78
Lower Yazoo district, Mississippi	1,458,678.75
Lower Tensas district, Louisiana	1,664,912.01
Atchafalaya and four other districts, Louisiana	2,620,078.62
Total	10,901,235.77

There were some items, probably engineering and administration, not included in the above, for on page 3534 the total for levees is given, $11,059,216.02, and the total for the river, $33,653,027.

Out of the above the Mississippi levees, it is seen, got $2,270,158.67, and, deducting the money spent previous to 1885, there is left $1,824,433.22, received since General CATCHINGS went to Congress, or a little over 20 per cent or one-fifth of the amount spent on levees. Before General CATCHINGS went to Congress the whole appropriations were at the rate of $2,120,887 per annum, and your district got one-fourth of the levee money; since he went the whole appropriations have been at the rate of $2,097,456 per annum, and your district has gotten one-fifth of the levee money.

But it is the dirt put in the levees, after all, that the people want, and on page 3518, etc., of the report for 1897 is a detailed account of the levees, except the per cent built by the United States in lower Louisiana, which is on page 3787.

I find by calculating the amount built by the United States, from the total and the per cent stated, that the various levee districts now contain as follows:

	Miles.	Total.	Built by United States.
			Per cent.	Amount.
		Cubic yds.
Lower St. Francis, Missouri and Arkansas	115	5,260,570	53	$2,788,102
White River, Arkansas	64	5,889,044	84	4,946,797
Upper Tensas, Arkansas and Louisiana	173	21,996,612	70	15,395,220
Lower Tensas, Louisiana	131	12,766,527	63	8,042,912
Atchafalaya and 4 others, Louisiana	468	36,066,863	63	22,772,123
Upper Yazoo, Mississippi	124	12,793,495	34	4,349,788
Lower Yazoo, Mississippi	186	22,174,392	31	6,962,600

Total built by the United States in Missouri, Arkansas, and Louisiana	cubic yards..	53,945,154
Total built by the United States in Mississippi	do....	11,312,288

More levee has been built by the United States in the 64 miles of the White River district than the 124 miles of the Upper Mississippi levee district and nearly two and a half times as much in the Upper Tensas as in the Lower Mississippi, although the latter has 13 miles the longer line.

The Upper and Lower Tensas in Arkansas and Louisiana have together 306 miles of levees, the Upper and Lower Yazoo 310, yet the United States have in round numbers built 23,000,000 cubic yards for them and 11,000,000 for you.

For every yard of dirt the Government has put up for you, you have put up 2 for yourselves; just across the river for each yard the Government built the people have put up only half a one. If the same ratio of help had been extended you, you would have gotten four times as much as you have received, and the Government has no right to build levees on the other side to force you to mortgage yourselves to build levees on this.

What, am I opposed to Government aid to levees? No! Distinctly I am in favor of it! But it must give aid equally, or make sure that in helping one it shall do no injury to another. You have not had help even in proportion to the length of your levees. The other side has 950 miles, you have 310; they got 13,000,000 yards, you got 11,000,000; their line is three times as long as yours, and they have had five times as much earth put up for them.

Since the new era of Government levee building began the debt of the Upper Mississippi levee district has trebled and that of the lower quadrupled, and to-day the former owes more than a million and a half, the latter over a million and a quarter. General CATCHINGS can not claim the credit of a policy without shouldering the responsibility for its results. He can not even claim that he had no evidence of the outcome of his policy. Many of the engineers gave warning. General Comstock pointed out the fallacy of it. Captain Townsend showed what was to be expected. Major Dabney has said it was a fight between the levees on the two sides and only a question of which would get broken, only in the dim future could they hope to hold it all. Mr. Coppee describes the result in these words: "The rapid closure or protection of many thousands of acres of comparatively worthless land by levees has produced a very pronounced and elevating effect on the flood level in the long-established levee districts. Large reservoirs have been closed, not by degrees, but immediately, giving the river no possible chance to accommodate itself to the change, except by an extensive rise in the flood plane, which in 1897 was decidedly disastrous to the levees protecting one of the richest and most highly developed agricultural countries in the world, with all the growing crops, mills, and manufacturing plants, towns, and cities, quite a network of railroads and rivers navigable during a large portion of the year."

But they say, "Send him back to Congress and let him finish it." Finish what? The mortgaging and destruction of the Yazoo Delta? I think it is time to change the plan and policy of the Government aid. Build the levees for the purpose of improving the river, but build so they shall not ruin our land. General CATCHINGS is in Congress to-day without a party to which he can claim to belong, to which he can turn to ask for aid in this matter, and he is estopped from calling on the Government to right the wrong done by a policy he has been advocating.

But I must invite your attention to the record of appropriations for rivers within the Third Congressional district. It is shown by the reports of the Chief of Engineers that at the time General CATCHINGS went to Congress the following rivers were being improved: Yazoo, Big Sunflower, Tallahatchie, Cold Water, Yalobusha, Tchula Lake, and Steeles Bayou, and that $202,500 had been appropriated in eleven years preceding. Since he went to Congress all improvement has stopped on the four last, and in the fourteen years $232,500 was appropriated. Yet the amount expended for river and harbor works has increased enormously. Neither can he take refuge behind the engineers in this by claiming adverse recommendation, because the full amount of money asked for has almost never been given, and in the report for 1888, page 1363, the engineer asked for $5,000 for Yalobusha and never has gotten one cent. In the report for page —— he asked for $50,000 for a survey of Big Sunflower and the Yazoo system, so as to make a plan for locks and dams, saying the river never had had enough money spent on it, yet no money has ever been given.

Now, I want to tell you about the Vicksburg Harbor and the Yazoo Canal. As you all know, the cut-off took place in 1876, and the city authorities and prominent citizens had a survey made the next year by Maj. Thomas G. Dabney, the able engineer whom we are all proud to claim as a fellow-townsman. He submitted a plan to the Government engineer board to hold the Delta Point, dredge the harbor, and bring the Yazoo River through from Old River. The board approved the Delta Point work and the harbor dredging, but said the Yazoo could not keep its own mouth washed out and it could not be expected to keep the lake clear. They fixed the cost so high that it killed all hope of getting the Yazoo through. Congress made appropriations and the work went on at Delta and in the harbor until in 1883, when the dredges took out 350,000 cubic yards and the river filled in 1,250,000. Then Capt. William L. Marshall threw up the job and said it would cost $2,600,000 and the whole town was only worth about $2,400,000, or less by $200,000 than the cost. This put an end to all work except at Delta Point for several years, until the city had another survey made by Mr. H. St. L. Coppee. He proposed a slack-water basin to be surrounded by dams to keep out the muddy water, and the Government engineers indorsed the plan. Congress again made appropriations, and dredging went on for several years, till it became apparent that the bottom of the canal raised up as fast as it was dredged down.

Then our energetic and wide-awake chairman of the harbor committee, Capt. E. C. Carroll, stirred things up and a survey was ordered by the river and harbor bill of 1890 for the mouth of Yazoo River.

The survey was made, under Maj. J. H. Willard, by Mr. H. M. Marshall, and he showed that the present mouth of the Yazoo is stopped up every year by the Mississippi because it comes in on the shallow side of the Mississippi, but at Kleinston it would come in on the deep side. This survey also showed that the cost would not be as great as had been estimated. Then Major Willard justified the cost of the work by pointing out that it would give access all the year to the Yazoo and its tributaries—a system of rivers covering 800 miles of navigable waters.

Major Willard and Hon. L. W. Magruder went to Washington City in February, 1892, and explained the new status of affairs to the River and Harbor Committee, and for these reasons the river and harbor act approved July 13, 1892, appropriated $75,000 for purchase and clearing right of way.

The act approved August 18, 1894, appropriated $225,000 to continue the work and also $40,000 for the Vicksburg Harbor.

The act passed June 3, 1896, authorized the Secretary of War to make a contract to complete the work, to be paid for with the balance on hand and out of any money "as appropriations may from time to time be made by law, not to exceed in the aggregate $860,000, exclusive of the amount heretofore appropriated."

This also limited the amount to be paid by the Government to $400,000 in any one year.

The effect of this was to permit an appropriation to be made for this work in the next sundry civil bill.

This was done, and the sundry civil act of June 4, 1897, appropriated $350,000.

Right here I want to state one of my reasons for not opposing General CATCHINGS for Congress in 1896. The money for this work, in which we are all so vitally interested, was not available, except the small balance on hand, and no contract could be let with advantage to the United States until an appropriation should be made by the sundry civil bill. Many prominent citizens talked to me and expressed the opinion that the work would be jeopardized if a new man should be sent to Congress. This had weight with me, but I want to say right now that reason no longer exists.

I have explained that the river and harbor bill of 1896 authorized the letting of the contract to be paid for as the money may be appropriated, and that $50,000 was appropriated in June, 1897, which, with the money on hand, gives about half a million dollars now available. This would permit a contractor to do the work and be certain of a large part of his pay without delay. The Attorney-General of the United States has given his opinion in regard to these contracts, and he says that Congress ordered them and they must be let, and when they are finished, if the money is not already appropriated, they become a valid claim against the Government. The report of the engineers for 1896, page 4111, shows there were 36 of these contracts authorized, and the report for 1897 shows that work is going on now and has been for nearly a year on 31 of them. On 3 the engineers are figuring how to do the work for the money, and for a poor little bay on the coast of Oregon contract has been let, because no money was provided for it in the sundry civil bill, and the commerce, which was only 18,000 tons a year, is falling off at the rate of 7,000 tons per annum.

Yes, 31 and 3 and 1 only make 35, and I said there were 36 contracts. Well, we all know about that other one, and it will not bear talking about except among General CATCHINGS's friends, and they will not talk so much, now that the truth is made known about those other contracts.

But, in truth, if he had attended to this contract, and had the work done as he should, he would have been left without any excuse for asking the free-silver people of Warren County to send a pinchbeck gold bug to Congress. He has simply held back this work as a club to beat you into returning him to Congress.

There is only one other explanation that can be offered—he is utterly without influence in Washington City.

Respectfully, PATRICK HENRY.

STATE OF MISSISSIPPI, County of Warren:

This day personally appeared before me, the undersigned, justice of the peace in and for the county and State aforesaid, W. L. Polk, who, being by me first duly sworn, deposeth and says that he has examined and compared the figures contained in the above letter of Hon. PATRICK HENRY and find they are correct and agree with those in the published reports of the Chief of Engineers for 1885, pages 2932 and 2933, and for 1887, pages 3529, 3518, and 3787.

Witness my signature this 5th day of July, 1897.

W. L. POLK.

Sworn and subscribed to this 5th day of July, A. D. 1897.

JOHN GROOME,
Justice of the Peace.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for thirty minutes.

[Mr. MANN addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

[Mr. DOVENER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. BOREING. Mr. Chairman, I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read an amendment which I propose to offer to the pending bill at the proper time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the proposed amendment in the time of the gentleman.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 3, page 50, insert the following: "For the construction of lock and dam No. 21, Kentucky, $100,000."

Mr. BOREING. Mr. Chairman, the appropriation of public money for the improvement of rivers and harbors, like the protection of American industries, is a doctrine inherited from the Whigs and developed by the Republican party. The old Democratic doctrine opposed all Federal aid to internal improvements for the reason that it tended to paternalism and greed. In more recent years the trend of public sentiment and thought and legislation has been in the direction of liberal appropriations for internal improvements, until it has come to be the settled policy of the Republic to improve our rivers and harbors at the expense of the General Government.

It is natural that the Republican States, represented in the House and in the United States Senate by Republicans, would be the first to take advantage of these opportunities to improve their navigation by the improvement of their rivers and harbors. The region of the Great Lakes and the rivers in the Northern States have not only reaped a rich harvest from this source of revenue, but they have laid broad and deep the foundations upon which to demand more. The committee now comes, after having provided bountifully for this section of the country, and declares a policy. And what is it? "To him that hath shall be given, and from that hath not shall be withheld," until the time when the rivers and harbors that have had appropriations shall have been improved to their full capacity. But upon that theory of distribution of improvements there can be no end to appropriations, because they propose to distribute according to tonnage; and those streams which were first favored have the advantage in tonnage, and they will ever keep it, and these appropriations must be eternal. My objection, therefore, lies to the bill, to their policy, and to their theory.

In the remarks I make I want it to be understood that I do not mean to disparage the interest of any community or to reflect upon any member of this or any other Congress. I suppose the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has been as fair as any other number of men would have been under the same circumstances; and there are no two members upon this floor for whom I have a higher personal regard than for the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and my distinguished colleague from the Sixth district of Kentucky, who represents our State on that committee.

But, Mr. Chairman, the report from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors discloses certain facts. I beg leave to refer to those facts. In the first place, the city of Cleveland is very well provided for in appropriations, amounting to $2,925,000; the city of Cincinnati has not been overlooked, because she has an appropriation of $1,050,000; and the mouth of the Licking River, that little stream that flows into the Ohio River opposite Cincinnati, has an appropriation of $307,000. I do not know, or did not know until the other day, how Licking River got its name. A distinguished gentleman who lives near the head of the stream, and close to its mouth also, said that it took its name from the fact that an ordinary thirsty dog could lick it dry during one night at its highest tide. [Laughter.]

Now, I do not know whether that is true or not, but I will say, Mr. Chairman, that if you will take Licking River, Big Sandy, and Salt River and put them into the Cumberland River at the head of its channel, by the time it would flow through the Eleventh district, in the Cumberland River, this additional volume of water would not raise a riffle on the shoals, and yet Upper Cumberland River, in Kentucky, has not had one dollar appropriated to it. I desire in this connection to read the report of the Chief of Engineers, on page 2900:

Lock No. 21 (in Kentucky, 296.25 miles above Nashville and 28.75 miles below Burnside, Ky.).—By act of June 3, 1896, $20,000 were made specifically applicable to Locks Nos. 21 and 22, and the sites for those locks and abutments of dams have been acquired by the United States. There is no single lock, and perhaps it may be said no two or three locks in this system, the completion and operation of which would do as much for the commerce of the Upper Cumberland River as the completion and operation of Lock No. 21. This lock may be likened to Lock A of the lower river system, in that it would afford a 3-foot stage at Burnside, Ky., the same as Lock A will give at Nashville.

But, necessarily, this will only produce another lake-like reach of navigable water, as would Lock A on the lower river improvement, until provided with an outlet.

There is a balance of $17,035.39 remaining of the above that is expected to be applied in getting out stone for Lock 21.

That $17,035.39 remains to our credit. The same engineer, writing on page 2901, says:

For continuing operations at Locks 21 and 22, $300,000.

Now, what I complain of, Mr. Chairman, is, notwithstanding the Cumberland River has been surveyed and declared navigable to Burnside, Ky., notwithstanding it is navigable for small boats six months out of the year, notwithstanding it is in the plan of improvements, notwithstanding the engineers have reported in favor of the expenditure of $300,000 at Locks Nos. 21 and 22, we have been entirely ignored, and, so far as I know, all the appropriations, or nearly all, that have come to Kentucky have been applied or proposed to be applied at Cincinnati.

I know it is said that one-half of the improvements of the Ohio at Cincinnati are chargeable to Kentucky; but anyone at all acquainted with the situation must know, and does know, that all these appropriations, including the amount appropriated for the improvement of the mouth of Licking River, are intended to create a volume of water between Cincinnati and her Kentucky suburbs, because it is well known, and will not be denied, that the people of Covington and Newport do business and spend their money in Cincinnati; and I presume it will not be denied that this $1,357,000 to be expended there will not tend to develop or subserve any of the material interests of the State of Kentucky.

Mr. Chairman, it will not put into the market one dollar's worth of the products of the farm, the forest, or the mines of Kentucky, and that is the reason that I have come to this House asking that it give to the Upper Cumberland in Kentucky one-third of the amount that the engineer has recommended to be expended there.

We see in this bill, further, that for the State of Ohio and the States of Michigan and Wisconsin in the region of the Great Lakes there is an appropriation to the amount of over $16,000,000. And it has developed during this discussion that they are actually forcing upon the Detroit River, over the protest of the member of Congress who lives on that stream, nearly seventeen hundred thousand dollars. I appeal to the members of this House to say whether this is fair or not. I am satisfied that my distinguished colleague here will admit that this appropriation ought to be made to the Upper Cumberland, and that he will vote for it. I am not complaining of what is done for Cincinnati and the Licking River, but I am complaining of what has not been done for the Upper Cumberland.

Mr. Chairman, the Cumberland River flows 300 miles on an air line through the Eleventh district, and much farther by its meandering. Much of the Upper Cumberland is undeveloped. We have a valley of farming land as rich as the valley of the Nile. The 19 counties that compose the Eleventh district, 14 of which lie upon the Cumberland and its tributaries, have immense forests, covered by the growth that is usually found in that section. We have an inexhaustible coal field of the finest quality. That territory is inhabited by 258,000, according to the late census, of as loyal people to this Government as ever breathed upon this continent. I come to you in the name and upon the behalf of these people and I ask this appropriation.

I might have said that only 5 counties of the 19 are touched by a railroad. We only lack transportation for our products in order to make us one of the richest sections of this nation. I may say, Mr. Chairman, that the whole South is destined to be a great country. I am a Southern man by birth, by education, by residence, by interest, and by choice, and I stand for my people and my section. The South embraces a vast area of territory, reaching from Delaware to California. We have advantages in climate, in soil, and in resources; and when we have built the Nicaragua Canal, with our open-door policy in the Orient, the South will blossom like a rose. We come and ask at your hand but sheer justice when we ask for this appropriation.

Now, bear in mind, Mr. Chairman, that we are not asking for a new project. We are only asking that this committee follow out the line of their own policy, taking up the work where it has been started and continue it. If the Cumberland River was either an inlet or outlet of one of the Great Lakes it would to-day be locked and dammed from head to mouth. The great steamers of the ocean would be bearing the products of our forests and our coal mines to the constantly increasing demand of foreign markets.

Now, it may be said that when we propose to commence at Burnside and improve the river down, it is not in harmony with the present policy. But it is too late, Mr. Chairman, to make that plea, because it has dropped out in the discussion of this question that the whole system of improvement of the Ohio River is based upon the same theory. They commence at Bismarck and improve the river down, and promise now that it will go downward until it reaches the Mississippi. Moreover, this committee recognizes and continues by their appropriations the plan that began at Nashville and improved the Cumberland River both ways from that point.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. ALEXANDER] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LAWRENCE] lay great stress upon the importance of having sufficient depth of water in the Buttermilk Channel and the Boston Harbor to allow the largest vessels that come into our ports to load to their full capacity with American products and to sail to foreign markets. I desire to call attention to the fact that the wealth of this country is hidden away in the mountains and mostly on the smaller streams, and it is as important that we develop this wealth and bring it down the smaller to the larger streams until it reaches the harbors on the great ocean as it is to provide for the shipment of these products from what they are pleased to call our great national harbors.

One error that I believe the committee has fallen into, to the detriment of fair legislation to all sections of the country, is their attempt to legislate and make appropriations upon their personal knowledge rather than to avail themselves of the information and recommendations of the engineers of the War Department, the appointed agents of the Government, who have been trained and educated for the work assigned them, and who have made the investigations and surveys of these streams and made impartial reports, suggestions, and recommendations as to the amounts that should be expended on the different projects under consideration.

It will be observed, Mr. Chairman, that this committee has not condemned the project commenced by a former Congress to improve the Upper Cumberland from Burnside toward its mouth, and the fact is, as I have learned from the chairman of the committee, they have not had time to visit the Upper Cumberland and inform themselves by actual observation of its capacity for improvement and the interests that its improvement would subserve. And I will further point out the fact that neither the chairman, in his speech on the apportionment bill, nor any member of the committee has dared to discuss with me the comparative importance to the State of Kentucky of the improvement of the Upper Cumberland as recommended by the engineers, with the improvement of the mouth of the Licking River as provided for in this bill.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] said the other day, "Wherever you find an Ohio man, you find him with his face turned toward the national capital," and, in my opinion, he might have added, "and with his hand stretched toward the National Treasury." This is not at all discreditable to the Ohio people, because it shows that they are an enterprising and progressive people, and progress has no mercy on beliefs and creeds, political or religious. I do not blame Cincinnati for availing herself of all the appropriations charged to Kentucky, but the Representatives from Kentucky are to blame if they allow it to be done without entering their protest against such action. I am not blaming the great cities of the country for grabbing the lion's share of the $60,000,000 appropriated by this bill for the rivers and harbors, but the men who represent rural districts are to blame if they do not stand up for their rights and demand an equal recognition for the improvement of the navigable streams available for carrying into market the products of our farms, our factories, our forests, and our mines.

I realize, Mr. Chairman, how easy it is for one of the great committees of this House, with the National Treasury behind it, to take care of enough interests to insure the easy passage through Congress of almost any bill that it may propose. But I would remind the Republican members of this body that there will come a time when the people of the United States will sit in judgment and pass upon all of our official acts. And I would further remind my Republican colleagues that our Administration will need the Fifty-eighth as much as it will need the Fifty-seventh Congress, and if the Republican party maintains itself in power it must be just and fair to all sections of the country in the enactment as well as the administration of the law.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HEPBURN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. CUNNINGHAM, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 827. An act for the relief of the trustees of the Presbyterian Church of Dardanelle, Yell County, Ark.;

H. R. 3020. An act for the relief of Rev. William T. McElroy; and

H. R. 12740. An act making an apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the Twelfth Census.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That it is with deep regret and profound sorrow that the Senate hears the announcement of the death of Hon. CUSHMAN KELLOGG DAVIS, late a Senator from the State of Minnesota.

Resolved, That the Senate extends to his family and to the people of the State of Minnesota sincere condolence in their bereavement.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the business of the Senate be now suspended to enable his associates to pay fitting tribute to his high character and distinguished services.

Resolved, That the Secretary transmit to the family of the deceased and to the governor of the State of Minnesota a copy of these resolutions with the action of the Senate thereon.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

[Mr. MADDOX addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, judging from the character of this debate, an unusual condition is presented by the House upon this bill. Out of the 357 members of this House it would appear that at least 340 of them are opposed to the bill which has been reported by the committee, and that there are only 17 in favor of it, these 17 constituting the members of the committee. I do not rise for the purpose of giving notice of any amendment which I intend to offer, or to make any specific complaint against the bill.

Many objections have been urged against it. Members have complained that their particular district or State has been discriminated against or that waterways and harbors within their respective sections have been neglected by this committee. It was left to the gentleman from Kentucky who has just spoken [Mr. BORELING] to cap the climax of criticism by stating, as I recall his language, that $70,000 is included in this bill for a waterway against the protest of the member within whose district that waterway is situated.

The gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN] presented an elaborate table of figures to which he referred in addressing the House and by which he contrasted the volume of appropriations made in those States which are represented by membership on the committee with the remaining 28 States not so represented, and attempted to show that the committee had prepared this bill from a sectional and partial standpoint.

The distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], in his usual forceful manner, made a general attack, not only upon the bill, but generally on appropriations for river and harbor improvement. There was one feature of the gentleman's argument with which I was particularly impressed. He contended that the provisions of a river and harbor bill should not include appropriations for any waterway which did not affect commerce interstate in its character. This proposition seems plausible on its face, but I am of the opinion that difficulties would arise in making the application.

There are to-day various waterways and harbors upon which are carried hundreds of thousands of tons of commerce between the different States, but which were comparatively insignificant and local in their importance until the National Government began to make appropriation for improvement in recent years. As our country develops and traffic and the demand for transportation increases, new waterways, which seem at the time insignificant and yet contain possibilities of future growth and commerce, will demand the attention of the National Government.

I assume that the aid which the Government has for years been extending to internal improvements of this character will continue indefinitely as the policy of the Government. I can not conceive that any of these complaints which have been made against the present bill are well founded in fact. I have been one of the persistent and importunate members who have continuously waited upon the River and Harbor Committee seeking to have improvements and appropriations included in this bill.

I have not received recognition to the extent I desired nor, as I believe, to the extent of the needs of my district, but I realize the fact that if the demands of every member had been met and all the recommendations of the engineers had received appropriations, that the aggregate amount contained in the bill would have staggered even the liberality of this House and would have subjected the committee to merited criticism. I think I appreciate some of the difficulties which confronted the committee.

While the committee may have sought to set up certain standards and tests to judge of the worthiness of improvements, yet they found it impossible to rigidly adhere to them, and such has been the experience of all committees in the past. The one supreme test is the amount of tonnage to be affected by the improvement and not the location of the waterway nor the persistence of the interests involved.

The distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], who is chairman of the committee, has had too long and honorable service in this House to be affected by criticisms intended for home consumption. I believe that he and the entire membership of the committee in the preparation of this bill have endeavored to discharge their duty to this House and the country with fidelity and impartiality, and that sectional considerations have not entered into their deliberations. However, Mr. Chairman, I did not rise for the purpose of defending the committee, but it did occur to me that some member of this body having no official connection with the committee should give expression to these sentiments of justice, and which everyone knows express the truth.

Mr. Chairman, my object in seeking recognition was to address the committee briefly concerning a great inland waterway which is not subject to any of the objections which have been urged against other improvements, and which is national in its character. At the last session of the Congress I had the honor to introduce a bill for the survey of an inland waterway 16 feet in depth from the southern terminus of the Dismal Swamp Canal, at South Mills, Pasquotank County, N. C., thence extending down Pasquotank River to Albemarle Sound, thence across Albemarle Sound, Croatan Sound, Pamlico Sound, and Core Sound, with an outlet to the ocean, with the depth of 18 feet, through Ocracoke Inlet and Beaufort Inlet, North Carolina.

This bill was included within the provision of the emergency river and harbor bill of June 1900. The survey was made during the last summer and fall, and the report of same submitted to Congress, but it was not printed in time for the consideration of the River and Harbor Committee in connection with the pending bill. I have fortunately just secured an advance copy of the printed report, which is of exceeding interest in connection with this great project.

The report recommends that Beaufort Inlet be chosen as the outlet to the ocean rather than Ocracoke Inlet for several reasons, but chiefly because the dangerous navigation around Cape Lookout will thereby be avoided. It appears from the report that the distance from the southern terminus of the Dismal Swamp Canal on Pasquotank River to Beaufort Inlet is 211½ miles. It further appears that the cost of this projected interior waterway would not exceed $5,532,893.

I may say without fear of contradiction that it is one of the most important projects connected with the coastwise navigation of the United States. It was the dream of the early founders of the Republic to connect by a capacious canal the magnificent waters of Chesapeake Bay with those beautiful inland sounds in eastern North Carolina which I have mentioned. Ever since Sir Walter Raleigh's fleet entered the inlet on the coast of North Carolina and planted the first English colony on our Atlantic coast the dangers of Cape Hatteras and of Diamond Shoal have been known to the mariners on our coast.

Thousands of ships have foundered in its treacherous waters, and thousands of lives have found an unknown grave in the hungry vortex of its angry waves, and countless tons of produce have been scattered upon its shores. It stands as a menace to our coastwise shipping, and modern science and skill have failed materially to reduce the losses which annually occur along this perilous highway. It has been estimated that 10 per cent of our coastwise shipping is annually lost by shipwreck, and the great bulk of this is lost upon the bleak and dangerous coast of North Carolina.

How to avoid this dangerous coast and this menace to our shipping has been an ever-recurring problem. George Washington originally, it is said, formulated the scheme for the construction of what is now known as the Dismal Swamp Canal. This canal was constructed many years ago, but for some time was permitted to remain out of repair, until several years ago a company was organized and purchased the same, and they have recently reconstructed this important highway, so that the canal now has a depth of 8 feet, which it is proposed to maintain, and which is about the limit of depth which can be carried at all points across the North Carolina sounds.

This canal is an important factor in the development of commerce between the harbor of Baltimore and all points on Chesapeake Bay and the harbor of Norfolk and the various ports in eastern North Carolina.

There is also another canal which connects Chesapeake Bay and Norfolk Harbor with the waters of Currituck Sound and thence into Albemarle Sound, which is known as the Albemarle and Chesapeake Canal. This canal has also been in operation for many years and is owned by a company of enterprising and able men and has an efficient and zealous president, devoted to the development of the tide-water section of Virginia and North Carolina.

This canal also maintains a depth of 8 feet, and enjoys a large traffic with steamers and barges engaged in our coastwise commerce. The report of the district engineers, together with the division engineer and the Chief of Engineers, to which I have adverted, emphasizes the importance of this improved waterway; but they recommend that other and additional surveys be made of the route via the Albemarle and Chesapeake Canal and of all other existing routes between Norfolk Harbor and Beaufort Inlet in order to intelligently determine the respective availability of each. The report further states, as a conclusion, that before the National Government should embark in the construction of this waterway it should own one or more of the intervening canals and make the same a part of this great highway, to be maintained by the Government and kept open freely to all shipping. I concur most heartily in these recommendations of the engineers.

I now ask the indulgence of the committee to further call attention to some of the facts which go to make up and emphasize the importance of this inland route. From a commercial standpoint, its importance can not be magnified. One of the modern innovations in water traffic has been the construction of freight barges, a number of which are towed by a powerful tug and which are capable of carrying immense quantities of produce.

It is to the further development of this class of shipping that this waterway would be particularly valuable. The estimated value of the coastwise commerce to be immediately affected by this route has been conservatively fixed at $200,000,000, and the quantity of traffic to be affected is estimated to be at least 10,000,000 tons.

This water route would result in a large saving in tariff rates as compared with the present rates between the North and the South by railroad, and the annual saving to be thus effected is estimated to be between $750,000 and $1,000,000 annually. The annual saving of this sum to the coastwise commerce of the country would be 5 per cent on $20,000,000, which is four times the estimated cost of this waterway exclusive of the cost of the purchase of one of the canals referred to.

Another distinct advantage resulting from this route would be the reduction in insurance rates both on cargo and shipping. This can easily be calculated by adverting to the difference between marine insurance on cargoes by sailing vessels which navigate our coast around Cape Hatteras and the rate on cargoes shipped by barges through the present insufficient waterway and canal.

Again, the construction of this waterway could be utilized as an additional means of defense in time of war. Upon this point I quote from the report of the engineer:

> The inland waterway would afford an interior line of communication in time of war for transportation of supplies and for naval operations by light-draft vessels, such as torpedo boats and destroyers. Its value for such purpose can hardly be estimated, being similar to that of seacoast fortifications, which are rarely actually needed, but when the need arises it is most acute.

This waterway would afford a line of communication with our navy-yard at Portsmouth, Va., and with Fortress Monroe, and our Navy in Hampton Roads. The importance of this proposition has been recognized by engineers who have reported upon this matter in the past and by other eminent men engaged in the service.

I shall not consume the time of the House in discussing in detail the importance of this waterway in connection with local development of the eastern section through which it would pass, although it is by no means the least important of the results to flow from this beneficent enterprise.

The thrifty and progressive towns in eastern North Carolina, such as Elizabeth City, Edenton, Plymouth, Washington, and Newbern, would feel the impulse of this new artery of commerce, and the people of all the tide-water section of North Carolina and of other States thereby affected would be brought in touch with the commerce of our country.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I wish to refer to the national character of this interior waterway. Not only is the section concerned which is tributary to the Chesapeake Bay and the sounds of North Carolina, but every State upon our Atlantic Coast, including even those which border upon the Great Lakes, must feel an interest in this great project. If this waterway shall be established, it will only be one link in a chain which shall connect the city of Boston with Beaufort Inlet, North Carolina.

To make this clear it is only necessary to point to the geography of our Atlantic coast north of the Chesapeake Bay. Going north via Chesapeake Bay, we traverse an ample waterway until we reach a point near the city of Philadelphia, and thence via the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal we reach the Delaware River. Upon this ample stream is located the city of Philadelphia. By going up the Delaware River to Bordenton, N. J., we can cross by a canal to New Brunswick, N. J., on the Raritan River.

From this point there is fine inland navigation to the harbor of New York. From thence by Long Island Sound we reach Buzzards Bay, and the construction of a short canal from this point, which has already been begun, will complete the interior waterway, and thence the route is to Cape Cod and Boston. It will only be necessary for the Government to own and improve these intervening canals to open up this magnificent waterway from the New England States to the South.

But not only would this proposed waterway afford communication along our Atlantic coast States, but it would give them access to the Great Lakes and to the States and cities adjacent thereto. After reaching New York Harbor the magnificent Hudson River leads to the Erie Canal, thus bringing the Great Lakes within easy and cheap communication with all of our Atlantic seaboard.

If the members of this House will study this project in the light of its importance to the country, I believe it will impress itself upon them as a project of national and paramount importance, which is not exceeded by any other that is now under the consideration of Congress, and I ask them to join with me in pressing this improvement upon the attention of the Congress and of the commercial interests of the country.

It is not local in its character, and therefore escapes the criticism which has been directed against other projects. It discriminates against no one, because its benefits extend to every part of the country. It is along the line of the trend of the present thought of the country which seeks to evolve a plan for the easy and cheap transportation of our crude products on the one hand and our bulky manufactured products on the other between the different sections of our country.

It would promote the transportation of lumber and agricultural products from the South, and would give increased facilities for the transportation of coal and other products of the mines and bulky manufactured products from the North and the West.

Upon many of these articles at present the tariff rates are prohibitory, but by opening up this great artery of domestic commerce the interest of all sections of our country would be promoted, our domestic commerce would be increased, and the peoples of our common country would be bound closer together by the bonds of commerce, which, after all, will afford the surest guaranty of concord and fraternity. [Applause.]

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, in preparing the bill now before the House, practically ignores the claims of all those interested in the improvement of the Missouri River. The Missouri is one of the great rivers of this country, and within its basin is comprehended a large and intelligent population.

This great river has heretofore been recognized as navigable up as far as Fort Benton, a distance of 1,660 miles above Sioux City, where it strikes the line of the State of Iowa. And for this long reach of river, with its treacherous waters and yielding and crumbling banks, the pending bill carries an appropriation of only $40,000, to be used in maintenance of improvements already made and in protecting the bank and snagging the river for the facilitation of navigation and commerce—barely enough to provide a snagging boat and send it one trip up and down the river.

While the committee assumes to have found ample justification for making many appropriations for improvements of creeks and duck ponds that have never been considered of sufficient importance to find a place on the maps of the United States, they were not able to see any justification in the appropriation of any considerable amount for the Missouri River.

It may be true that the people interested in the Missouri River ought to be thankful for what is appropriated by this bill, like the old mail carrier of many years ago in northwestern Iowa before the advent of railroads, when that whole country was a bleak, unbroken prairie, storm swept in the winter time.

The old mail carrier was making his trip across prairies with his mail pouch from Fort Dodge to Sioux City, rigged out with a sled with board runners on which was placed an old store goods box, drawn by an old horse with rope gear and line, when out on the prairie, 20 miles from home, in a northwestern blizzard, such as was prevalent in that country at that early day, he met an old friend who accosted him by saying: "Hello, my old friend; how goes it with you out here in this blinding storm?" The old mail carrier, without stopping, answered: "Hard enough, hard enough. But thank the Lord it is as well with me as it is." So it is with those who happen to live on the Upper Missouri; they can thank the Lord and the Committee on Rivers and Harbors that it is as well with them as it is; that that stretch of river is deemed of sufficient importance to be thought worthy of an appropriation of $40,000.

It is not my purpose to attempt a criticism of the intentions or motives of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, but to show that it is pursuing an inconsistent policy.

When urged to increase the appropriation for the Missouri River, we are met by the statement that the commerce on that river is not of sufficient importance or magnitude to justify the Government in prosecuting a system of improvements, and that whatever appropriations are made are not in the interest of commerce or navigation, but in the interest of property owners along the banks of the river. If that be true, and the policy of the Government is to limit appropriations solely to the improvement of our lines of commerce, why make any appropriations for this river? Why not limit the appropriations to improvements in the interest of navigation and commerce? Let the committee report a bill carrying appropriations for the improvements of such rivers and harbors only in whose commerce the people generally are interested and that are not confined to the interest of particular localities, and I for one will be ready to support it.

While we are told that appropriations ought not to be made for the improvement of the Missouri River because such appropriations are not in the interests of commerce, but for the benefit of particular localities and individual property owners, yet it is a fact that is not attempted to be denied that the pending bill, as well as every appropriation bill that has been reported by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors for a number of years, carries large appropriations for the special interests of particular localities and individual property owners. This has been the recognized policy of the committee, and that policy is recognized by the pending bill.

I am not standing here urging or justifying or condemning this policy. What I do criticise is the policy, recently adopted, of abandoning the improvements of the Missouri River because it is claimed that that river is not of sufficient commercial importance to warrant appropriations for its improvement, and at the same time maintaining the system of making appropriations at other places for the same purpose that are discarded here.

Mr. Chairman, I am not prepared to advocate the general policy of appropriating money by Congress for the exclusive benefit of particular localities or individuals. I believe such a policy is vicious and ought not to be adopted; but there is a justice in equal distribution of privileges and benefits when they result from the appropriations of public moneys.

Many of the appropriations carried by this bill are for the improvement of small rivers and harbors that pertain only to local interests, that do not in any manner affect navigation or commerce outside of the immediate locality or State where they are situated. They are a benefit to the people of the State or locality where situated in furnishing convenient and cheaper transportation of local products, just as the building of a railroad or a public highway within a State benefits the people where located by furnishing better and cheaper means of transportation. The same reason that may be urged for the appropriation of public moneys for the benefit of the one may be urged with equal force in favor of the other. If this House find sufficient reason to support these provisions of the bill carrying appropriations for such purposes, then it ought on the same ground support a provision making an appropriation for the Missouri River, as has been done in a small measure in the past.

It has heretofore been the policy of the Government to make appropriations for the Missouri River.

At Sioux City, Iowa, in a distance of several miles, there has already been expended about $230,000. A plan for a complete system of dikes and revetments has been made by the Government engineers. Under this plan the work has been carried on, but not completed. In its uncompleted condition the work already done is liable to be destroyed by the action of the water and the expenditure already made rendered useless thereby.

The bill now pending proposes to abandon this point, as it is held up between the lower division and upper division of the Missouri River, without recognition anywhere. But suppose it should be included in the upper division, where it has been placed by the engineers or Missouri River Commission, it is still practically left to its fate, because the small appropriation of $40,000 for the upper division of the river, when distributed over a reach of more than 1,600 miles, will be entirely inadequate for maintenance or protection of the work already done.

The engineer in charge of this part of the work, in his report to the Secretary of War has submitted estimate for maintenance and for continuing the work already commenced.

The engineer says that "for the purpose of economical work in * * * the Sioux City reach, an estimate of $70,000 ($50,000 on the Iowa side and $20,000 on the Nebraska)" is submitted; and for maintenance for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, he estimates that there will be required $2,000 at South Sioux City and $50,000 at Sioux City.

Sioux City is one of the prosperous and growing cities of Iowa, having a population of more than 33,000. The city stands down close to the river banks. At the time that the improvements of the river front at this point were commenced the current was strongly thrown against the banks and was making rapid inroads toward the business parts of the city.

This has been checked by the dikes and revetments that have been built by the Government, and it does seem that to withhold appropriations and abandon these improvements now in their unfinished condition would be false economy, and would inevitably result in their being washed out and carried away by the swift current of the water in a few years. This is the only protection offered valuable property in the city lying near the river from the swift currents constantly threatening its banks.

At the proper time I shall offer an amendment to the bill making an appropriation for maintenance and protection of the banks of the river and improvement of the harbor at Sioux City, and also an amendment increasing the appropriation for improvements above Sioux City.

Mr. Chairman, there is still another feature of the bill to which I desire to call the attention of the House.

The shore line of the Missouri River lying contiguous to the district which I have the honor to represent is about 70 miles in length. In that distance the course of the river is very crooked and the current quite rapid. Owing to the short bends in the river the current, in some places, is thrown with great force against the banks. Along the river, on the Iowa side, the bottom is from 5 to 25 miles wide. The soil is a deep sandy loam, and is as productive of all the cereals capable of being produced in this climate as any land in the United States. The whole bottom along the river consists of well-improved farms occupied by an intelligent, industrious people.

For the purpose of ascertaining the condition of the river along this line I examined these localities some time ago and found places where whole farms had been cut away by the current. One farmer who owned as fine a farm as could be found in the State had moved his residence and farm buildings three times within the last eighteen months to keep them from going into the river, and still the current kept biting away the land so as to again endanger his buildings. While I was there I saw a large strip of the land give way to the encroachments of the current and drop into the river and was carried away to form a bar somewhere lower down. I have been informed of one quarter section of land of 160 acres on which there was a mortgage. The mortgage remaining unpaid, the mortgagee brought an action to foreclose, and while the suit was pending the river, with its rapid current, stole away seven-eighths of the land and left but 20 acres.

In some instances these ravages could be stopped by a rectification of the banks and course of the stream without great expense; in others by booms and mattresses erected to break the force of the current or change its course. Many of the farmers were pioneers in this country and have endured all the privations and hardships of pioneer life. They are more deeply interested in the protection of their property and will be more directly affected by improvements and rectification of the river at these points than are the people living in the localities where some of the appropriations provided for by this bill are to be expended. And the improvements here pointed out are just as essentially a public improvement as the latter.

The Missouri River is and always has been recognized as a navigable stream, and as such is subject to the navigation laws of the United States. Individuals have no right to go into this river without the consent of the Government and put down booms, mattresses, dikes, or revetments, so as to rectify the course of the stream or change its course. Yet the bill before the House offers nothing for the protection of this property.

When the bill is considered by sections, at the proper time I shall offer an amendment raising the appropriation for improving the Missouri River below Sioux City to $600,000, which I shall follow by another amendment making the appropriation also available for a rectification of the course of the river and the reenforcement of its banks.

If we adopt the view of the committee that the appropriation for the improvements of the Missouri River is not made in the interests of commerce, but for the protection of property located along the banks, then it is certainly true that in justice to all a portion of this appropriation, under the discretion of the Secretary of War, ought to be devoted to the purpose designated by such proposed amendment. I appeal to the members of this House to do justice to these people. If the policy adopted by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and outlined by this bill is sustained, then carry out its provisions by doing equity to all persons and communities where at least it may be done, if such a thing as equity or right is to be found in the bill; and if it can not be found there, then give it a show of equity by equalizing as far as possible the benefits to accrue from it.

If the appropriation carried by the bill for the Lower Missouri is not for the facilitation of navigation or the promotion of commerce, but for the protection of property along the line of the river, then let the authority be vested in the Secretary of War, under whose supervision the expenditure is to be made, to apply it where, in his judgment, it is most needed. Let the bill be so re-formed that the appropriation, or a part of it, may be used to rectify the course of the river and reenforce and strengthen its banks.

The bill now pending seems to confine the appropriation to "continuing improvements" that have already been commenced, "as the Secretary of War may designate."

The proposed amendment, if adopted, will vest in the Secretary of War the authority to use the appropriation on other portions of the river as well, if in his judgment it is practicable to do so.

The appropriation is not large, but what there is of it should be applied at such places along the river where it is most needed, and that it may be properly applied the question of designation is proposed to be left to the discretion of the Secretary of War. [Loud applause.]

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment to this bill which my colleague [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] will offer at the proper time will be accepted and adopted. I trust the honorable gentlemen composing the Committee on Rivers and Harbors will not antagonize it; but if they do, with due respect to the committee, I appeal to the members present each to discharge his duty. I believe that the supreme obligation of each member on this floor is to act in accordance with his own convictions of right, and that he owes no duty to follow the wishes or recommendations of a committee unless they are sustained by sound reason and founded upon principles of justice and equality.

For one, I propose to represent my constituents and voice their sentiments in voting for this amendment.

The fact that the 17 States represented on the Committee on Rivers and Harbors have been well cared for—indeed, that a very large part of the colossal sum appropriated and authorized by this bill goes to those States—has been severely criticised on this floor. These criticisms have gone abroad to the country. Whether they are just or unjust, the people will determine, regardless of the action of this House. That millions upon millions of dollars have been appropriated in response to the demands of certain localities, and that urgent and more modest requests which reached this committee from other localities—less favored, perhaps—have been summarily refused, has practically been admitted in the course of this debate.

This bill carries a direct appropriation of $22,792,711.30 and authorizes the making of contracts to the amount of $37,142,704 more. If the action of the committee in devoting so large a part of this direct appropriation to the States represented on the committee furnishes just provocation for criticism or occasion for surprise, then, in my judgment, its action in distributing the benefits which are to flow from the expenditure of the sum authorized to be used is sufficient cause for alarm. The $22,792,711.30 directly appropriated is not distributed as equitably as it should be, but still 35 States and the District of Columbia share it. But of the larger sum authorized by this bill to be expended the sum of $29,541,853 will be expended within 20 States, 14 States represented on this committee receiving $24,817,896 of this sum.

The committee has passed judgment, as it were, on its powers and duties, construed them strictly, and determined that it can or will recommend appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors in those cases only where there is great or considerable traffic by boat. It seems to have overlooked the fact that many of the navigable rivers to-day were unnavigable, wholly so, until after the expenditure of vast sums of money. Even where millions have been spent millions more are demanded and often required.

We appealed to this committee for a reasonable appropriation for one of the great rivers of the country—one that has been a great highway of commerce, and would be to-day if not neglected—and we are told the tonnage of freight carried on the Missouri River is too small to justify the appropriation of a sum sufficient to do the work, and as a kind of consolation they offer the beggarly sum of $340,000 to improve a river nearly 3,000 miles in length, upon the banks of which preside some dozen of the proud cities of the West, and whose waters flow through or lash the shores of a group of splendid States that constitutes the great producing section of this Union.

If the proposed amendment is adopted, much can be done toward reclaiming this river and building up a traffic upon it; and incidentally, by confining the river to its usual and proper channel, the magnificent homes of the sturdy farmers who reside along its shores, representing as they do in many instances the toil, hardships, and accumulations of a lifetime, would be protected.

Will this House, so lavish in other matters, deal in a niggardly spirit with the noble people who have erected their homes along this mighty river, who have done so much toward the material development of the great West and Northwest, and who are as justly entitled to the bounty of the Government, nay, more entitled than many of the beneficiaries of this bill? This Congress has appropriated millions for the benefit of great corporations; millions more are induced by a sentiment to beautify the national capital; is prodigal in its appropriations for Government buildings, but seems to hesitate in a matter affecting the interests and welfare of a great mass of people who inhabit the region to which I have referred.

Against the recommendations of this committee I array the reports of former Committees on Rivers and Harbors and the action of this House upon those reports.

Conscious that a just and intelligent constituency will suffer irreparable loss and damage if this river is abandoned, and confident that I reflect their wishes, I shall vote to amend the committee bill so as to make the appropriation for the Missouri River between Sioux City and its mouth $600,000 instead of $300,000, and to strike out the part of the bill that proposes to abolish the Missouri River Commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for fifteen minutes.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, in the short time allotted to me I desire to call the attention of the committee to what must be termed a new policy recommended in this bill with regard to the Missouri River. It is the policy of the unnatural mother who does not kill the child outright, but permits it to die of the slower process of starvation. Since the creation of the Missouri River Commission, in 1884, the annual appropriation for that great river amounted to from $700,000 to $800,000.

The last appropriation under the jurisdiction of the present Committee on Rivers and Harbors was—how much do you suppose? Not one dollar. In the other House $250,000 were inserted, and the conference committee finally acquiesced in this concession. This year $340,000 are proposed to be appropriated. This means that the system of permanent improvement is to be abandoned, for it can be easily shown that this amount will not permit of any new work, it being barely sufficient to properly protect the actual improvements already made.

And if a further proof were necessary that it is really the purpose of the committee to abandon the river, it would be found on page 76 of the bill, where it is proposed to abolish the Missouri River Commission; in other words, to dispense with the services of men who have made the peculiarities of that river a life study, and, after sixteen years of experience, are ready to demonstrate to the satisfaction of all who take a real interest in the Missouri, that its systematic improvement is not only possible, but practicable, and at a cost not exceeding similar improvements of other river courses. And the proposition just referred to is seriously made in the face of the fact that the existence of the Missouri River Commission causes very little additional expense, because most of its members are simultaneously serving on the Mississippi River Commission, so that at present the Government really has the benefit of two services for only one salary.

In the light of these facts the proposition of the committee permits, as I said before, of only one explanation. The Missouri River is to be abandoned. The policy wisely and bravely inaugurated in 1884, by which notice is served on the civilized world that American engineering skill is equal to the most difficult tasks, is to be changed into one of meek surrender. We are asked to join the committee in a declaration that our previous policy was all a mistake; that we thought we were as equal to the emergency of overcoming the obstacles of nature as former generations have been, but that we have recently been seized by a degree of impotency which compels us to confine our exertions to the improvement of creeks and the dredging of harbors. But the Missouri? No, that is too large a proposition for a generation of pygmies such as we are!

Such is the report of the committee. And what are the reasons assigned for this change of policy? The tonnage is too small, it is said. The freight carried in 1899 amounted to only 286,000 tons. Why, there are some creeks in the East, they say—I can not pronounce their names—which carry a larger tonnage than the Missouri River. Possibly so, Mr. Chairman. But I should like to know whether you, or the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, or anyone else, would undertake to run a railroad train before the roadbed is constructed and the rails are laid? The reason why there is little or no traffic on the Missouri is because the river has not yet had the benefit of systematic improvement. It is because from the time of the discovery of America up to nearly 1880 no improvement was attempted.

This was excusable in the early periods of our history, but after the Republic had been securely established against outside interference, after internal improvements had become so pressing that they became part of a national policy supported by both parties, after American skill and enterprise had seized upon our great waterways as the cheapest means of transportation, after the supreme necessity of their improvement had been recognized by appropriation after appropriation, after all that, to seriously propose that we relapse into barbarism, that we make a sacrifice of the ten millions already expended, that we refuse to pave that way for the commerce of the great West and Northwest which nature has already provided—that, gentlemen, would be a beginning of the new century of which we ought to be heartily ashamed.

The committee says there is now no traffic on the Missouri River, and in the same breath it decrees that there shall be none in the future by denying us the only means of securing it.

It is difficult, perhaps, to correctly estimate the amount saved to the farmers and producers of the West by the policy and the determination of former Congresses to improve the Missouri River. That it exceeds by far the sums expended for such improvement is reasonably certain. The very minute you decide here to abandon the river will surely mark the time of a general increase of railroad freight rates all along the line. This phase of the question was lucidly presented to the committee by a member of this House. It is strange, indeed, that this argument alone should not have been sufficient to deter the committee from the course it has decided upon.

But there is still another very important consideration. In a statement given out, upon the solicitation of a St. Louis newspaper, by the president of the Missouri River Commission, Col. Amos Stickney, part of which I shall incorporate in my remarks, I find the following:

> In a distance of only 18 miles in the vicinity of Jefferson City, Mo., the area of new land formed by the rectification works amounted to 5,500 acres, and the area of land protected was 12,800 acres. Computing this at a fair price of $50 per acre, the sum of $915,000 was added to the wealth of the country, as incidental to the improvement of navigation.

This is on the stretch of the river where the commission had started to carry out its plans for permanent improvement, between Jefferson City and the mouth. The money expended here proved a splendid investment for the country, technically as well as financially, and it was not spent for the protection of private property in land, but solely for navigation purposes.

It seems the commission is being blamed for the policy of protecting the banks, for which, it is true, large sums have been expended. But in reality whose fault was it? The commission and especially President Stickney, that most excellent river engineer, has always protested against the diversion of the general appropriation to special points, but without avail. Congress simply ordered the commission to dozens of different points without regard to the continuity of the work, and as a result the amounts which should have been devoted to purposes of systematic and permanent improvement were frittered away to do piecemeal work here, there, and elsewhere. The policy which the committee complains of is the fault of Congress and not of the commission, yet it is proposed to punish the commission for what Congress has done.

Here the question presents itself: Is the policy of protecting lands incidental to the improvement of navigation a mistaken policy? The committee, in endeavoring to answer the question, say:

While not assuming to decide whether such expenditures are proper subjects for appropriation by the Federal Government, the members of the committee are clearly of the opinion that such expenditures do not properly belong to a committee whose province is to recommend appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors.

But if this be true, why does the same committee authorize appropriations for the construction of levees and the protection of lands on the Lower Mississippi? Mind you, I am not opposed to these appropriations; but why this discrimination? If it is right and proper to protect the land of the Southern planter, why should it not also be right and proper to protect the land of the Missouri farmer? In my own district the town of New Haven, or at least the lower portion of it, is in immediate danger of being swept away.

I presented the case to the committee as best I knew how, but the answer is that the committee has no jurisdiction, while at the same time it provides very liberally against just such contingencies on the Lower Mississippi. Is not this just a little inconsistent? The Committee on Rivers and Harbors has assumed jurisdiction over all the cases of levee appropriations, although there is a committee of this House, of which I have the honor to be a member, especially created for that purpose. If that jurisdiction is doubtful, either from a parliamentary or constitutional point of view, in all cases which involve the protection of lands, why is it that the committee is claiming and exercising it in one case and denying it in the other, although they are parallel cases?

In conclusion, let me suggest, Mr. Chairman, that a bill carrying over $20,000,000 of immediate appropriations for rivers and harbors, without at the same time properly providing for the largest river of the country, will be justly regarded as an anomaly by the American people. If the great Missouri, with its thousands of miles of length and with sufficient water, if properly cared for, to carry the largest boats from the Northwestern grain fields to the Gulf, is not deserving of the attention of the National Government, surely no other river is, and I say not a dollar of expenditure for the rivers of the country is justifiable if the improvement of the Missouri should be deemed unwarranted.

Half a dozen States and many millions of people are interested in this question, and when they learn what it is proposed to do here a hurricane of protests will sweep down upon this House. We know that the Missouri can not be improved in one generation, but this is surely no reason why we should give up the task after sixteen years of practical work has demonstrated the feasibility of the improvement beyond the shadow of a doubt. If those living to-day can not finish the job, those living to-morrow will take it up where we left off; and, in my judgment, it is the bounden duty of each generation to contribute its share toward the final consummation of the great object. The above-mentioned statement of Col. Amos Stickney, the president of the Missouri River Commission, is in part as follows:

The first works undertaken by the Government on the Missouri River below the mouth of the Yellowstone were at Nebraska City and at St. Joseph, under small appropriations made in 1876. Subsequently other appropriations were made for these and other localities, until in 1881 there were fourteen separate localities where work had been ordered, scattered from St. Charles to Vermilion, over a distance of 830 miles.

In 1881 a plan for the systematic improvement of the river from the mouth to Sioux City was submitted by Major (now Colonel) Suter, and in 1882 Congress appropriated $850,000 for the general improvement of the river, and a large plant for the work was prepared. In 1884 the Missouri River Commission was created to take charge of the work, and $640,000 was appropriated.

INSUFFICIENT APPROPRIATIONS.

In the first report made by the commission, in December, 1884, a general plan was outlined. It was now hoped that a thorough improvement of the river had been inaugurated and would be vigorously prosecuted. The commission concentrated their efforts as much as possible upon the reach of river in the vicinity of Kansas City, and urgently recommended in their reports that not less than $1,000,000 per year should be appropriated for continuous work from Kansas City down. The recommendations of the commission, however, were not carried out. In the appropriation years of 1884, 1886, 1888, $2,015,000 was appropriated, of which less than $800,000 could be expended on the continuous work—that is, for the six years from 1884 to 1890, less than one-tenth of the amount asked by the commission was provided for the systematic work.

In the act of 1890 Congress directed that the appropriation of $800,000 made that year should, with certain specified exceptions, be expended in the systematic improvement of the river from its mouth up, in reaches, to be designated by the commission and approved by the Secretary of War. Under this act the river from its mouth to Sioux City was divided into six reaches. The first reach extended from the mouth of the river to the mouth of the Osage, about 142 miles. By the terms of the act it became necessary to suspend operations, commenced in the vicinity of Kansas City, and at large expense move all of the plant several hundred miles down river to begin over again the work of systematic improvement at the head of the first reach. In 1891 the new start was made, though a considerable portion of the appropriation of 1890 was necessarily reserved to prevent destruction of work previously started up the river.

HOW IMPROVEMENT IS PROFITABLE.

In 1892 the appropriations were made continuous for four years, amounting in the aggregate during the four years to $2,710,000, of which about three-fourths was applicable to the systematic work. With this provision work was carried on vigorously with a large plant, operating on a continuous stretch of 45½ miles of river, extending from a point about 14 miles above the mouth of the Osage down to the mouth of the Gasconade. This was, perhaps, one of the worst stretches on the river. The success of the work was marked. A deep navigable channel was formed and the banks aligned and built up. In a distance of only 18 miles in the vicinity of Jefferson City the area of new land formed by the rectification works amounted to 5,500 acres, and the area of land protected was 12,800 acres.

Computing this at a fair price of $50 per acre, the sum of $915,000 was added to the wealth of the country, as incidental to the improvement of navigation. The cost of this work was about $44,500 per mile, about the same per mile as is estimated for the improvement of the Mississippi from St. Louis to Cairo. A continuation of the work would undoubtedly have developed a lessening of cost per mile.

In the river and harbor act of 1896 the appropriation for the Missouri River below Sioux City was cut down to $300,000 and provisos added calling for work at nine different localities other than that at which the systematic work was in progress. This was the beginning of a virtual abandonment by Congress of the purpose to make an effective, general improvement of the river for navigation. In 1897, 1898, 1899 the appropriations were $300,000 per year, and in 1900 $250,000. In the five appropriation acts 1896 to 1900 seventeen detached localities were named where work was to be performed, one of which was in the Kaw River.

DETACHED WORK NOT PERMANENT.

The effect of this large reduction of appropriations and scattering of the small amounts available to points from Omaha to Pelican Bend, a distance of 650 miles, was, of course, disastrous to effective work for improvement of the river, and very embarrassing to the commission and the officers charged with the execution of the work. The systematic work on the first reach came to a complete stop. The unit cost of the various kinds of work was largely increased on account of the necessity for moving steamboats, barges, pile drivers, and various other items of plant over long distances, and returning them again to the boat yard at Gasconade, or making expensive provision for their care at other points during the winter season. The working plant became depleted, there being no funds available for renewals. The frequent disorganizing and reorganizing of working forces, in taking up separate pieces of work, was also very expensive. The work done at these localities was largely detached work—that is, not connected with any other work or with fixed points—and subject to destruction by changes in the flow of the river above and about them.

What is absolutely necessary for a proper control of the river and for the permanency of works is that the regulation should be continuous downstream, so that works once placed shall not be destroyed or rendered useless by changes in the approach of the flow from above. On account of the soft material of its bed and banks and its great flood velocities, the control and regulation of the Missouri River is as difficult, perhaps, as that of any river in the country, excepting possibly the Lower Mississippi, where the forces to contend with are greater. The difficulty consists almost entirely in making the works stand on such an unstable foundation, and many devices have been tried in their construction. That works can be made to stand and that the river can be fully controlled and regulated has been abundantly proven by the work done by the commission, and at a cost that is not excessive when compared with other river improvements.

NEED OF SUSTAINED INTEREST.

The work done in the systematic and continuous general improvement on the first reach, in accordance with the Congressional act of 1890, covered 45½ miles of river, from just above Jefferson City down to the mouth of the Gasconade River. The work was entirely successful, in accordance with the adopted plan, and covered nearly one-third of the reach, when, in 1896, interest in the work seemed to subside and appropriations were cut down, on the ground that there was no considerable commerce. It was a well-known fact, before commencement of work, that boats could not be profitably employed on the river in its natural state, and that was the principal reason for improving. It came to be an admitted fact, also, that a continuous improvement must be made to be effective. As the principal part of the expected commerce on the lower part of the river must pass the mouth of the river into, or out of, the Mississippi, it is not clear what commerce could have been expected before the opening of the river to its mouth. Let us suppose that a railroad were projected, over which, when it should be completed, a large through traffic was assured; the building of a few miles of the road, unconnected with its outlet, would hardly be expected to produce returns commensurate with its cost.

It has not been considered the province of the Missouri River Commission to urge the appropriation of money for the improvement of the river. It is our duty to furnish information and to carry on to the best of our ability the work for which Congress sees fit to provide. The general improvement of the river, opening it to commerce and carrying with it as an incident the complete protection and great enhancement in value of all property along its banks, is a matter to be urged by the people of the Missouri Valley, whose interests are involved, if it is to be urged by anyone. Congress and its committees, having consideration of national improvements, certainly can not be expected to provide means for improvements for which there is no pressing demand by those who might be expected to be interested.

The present chairman of the River and Harbor Committee of the House, as well as his predecessor, informed me that while many appeared before the committee asking for appropriations for the Missouri River, it was a rare thing for anyone to ask for the general improvement of the river. Requests were confined to asking for protection of various points, and the committee was decidedly of the opinion that mere protection of land or other property, unless incidental to the general improvement of the river for commerce, was inadmissible.

APPROPRIATIONS LOCALIZED.

Amidst the general apathy concerning the systematic work on the river, there have been intermittent efforts by a few to carry it on, and the commission has constantly urged that the effective improvement by continuous work should not be defeated by the dispersion of funds to various scattered localities.

The efforts to localize appropriations during the past few years have, however, prevailed to such an extent as to completely paralyze the general work. As a natural consequence, the effective improvement of the river will probably be postponed until such time as there will be an awakening of public sentiment to the desirability of its accomplishment. That the work will be done some time I think hardly admits of a doubt. In the meantime, probably Congress will be forced to yield to demands for fragmentary, disconnected works which, in the aggregate, will cost more than a complete improvement, and still there will be no commerce on the river.

With regard to prospect of making permanent improvements which will assure a deep navigable channel, I answer unhesitatingly that such improvements can be made to not only give ample channels at the lowest stages of the river, but to add millions of dollars to the value of property in the valley. As to the prospect of making them, however, I can only reply that it lies with the people of the Missouri Valley.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOPKINS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 13189, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate upon the bill which has just been considered by the committee (H. R. 13189) come to a close at 2 o'clock on Monday, or on the next legislative day on which this bill is before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that general debate upon the bill that has just been considered in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be closed at 2 o'clock on Monday next, or the next legislative day. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

DEATH OF HON. FRANK G. CLARKE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair submits the following letter for the information of the House:

STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Concord, January 10, 1901.

SIR: It is my painful duty to inform you of the death of the Hon. FRANK G. CLARKE, Representative from the Second district of New Hampshire in the Fifty-fifth and Fifty-sixth Congresses of the United States, which occurred at his home in Peterboro on January 9.

Congressman CLARKE was held in high esteem by the people of his district and of the State. His public career as speaker of the New Hampshire house of representatives, member of the State senate, and Representative in Congress has been alike creditable to him and to our State, and his private life has been such as to win for him universal respect. His death is mourned by all classes of our citizens.

Yours, very sincerely, CHESTER B. JORDAN,
Governor.

Hon. DAVID B. HENDERSON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

The SPEAKER. This communication will be duly noted in the Journal.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting an additional estimate of appropriation for armament of fortifications—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting an additional estimate of appropriation for buildings at Governors Island—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

By Mr. VANDIVER: Petition of Michael Scherer, to accompany House bill to place his name on the pension roll—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

SENATE.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last, when, on request of Mr. HOAR, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Journal will stand approved.

ELECTORAL VOTES OF MISSOURI AND IOWA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate two communications from the Secretary of State, transmitting certified copies of the final ascertainment of the electors for President and Vice-President appointed in the States of Missouri and Iowa; which, with the accompanying papers, were ordered to lie on the table.

FRENCH SPOLIATION CLAIMS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting the conclusions of fact and of law filed under the act of January 20, 1885, in the French spoliation claims relating to the vessel sloop Rainbow, Joseph Howland, master; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting the conclusions of fact and of law filed under the act of January 20, 1885, in the French spoliation claims relating to the vessel ship Fox, Coffin Whippey, master; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster-General; which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., January 12, 1901.

SIR: Referring to the communication sent you under date of May 29, 1900, accompanied by reports from the various Bureaus of this Department giving detailed statements of useless papers which it was desired to have disposed of, in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress approved February 16, 1889, being "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the Executive Departments," I have the honor to transmit herewith, at the request of the chairman of the joint committee, supplemental reports containing certain specific information omitted from the former reports.

Very respectfully, CHARLES EMORY SMITH,
Postmaster-General.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls the attention of the Senate to the fact that several communications have been received from heads of Departments touching useless papers and their disposition. I think one was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, another to the Committee on the Library, and another to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment. Allusion is made here to a joint committee on this subject. The Chair has not been able to get information as to whether there is a joint committee having entire jurisdiction of the subject.

Mr. COCKRELL. Under a law passed in 1888 or 1889 for the disposition of useless and valueless papers in the different Departments, each Department is required to submit to Congress a written report giving a list of the documents to be disposed of, stating that they are no longer useful for historical purposes or for current business. The report is to be made to Congress, and thereupon the President of the Senate appoints one Senator and the Speaker of the House appoints one member of the House, and they constitute a committee to examine the papers and submit a report to the Senate and House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Was there such a committee created?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not know whether it has been created or not. It is not a permanent committee. It has to be appointed each time a report is made.

I will state the reason for passing the act. There were many documents in the Departments, and it was not believed at that time that it would be safe or judicious for Congress to authorize the head of a Department alone to determine whether the papers in his office were useful for historical purposes or for current business, and if not so useful to destroy them. It was thought best that Congress should retain some power over them, and for that reason the law required the head of the Department to make a report stating what the documents were, and then one Senator was appointed and one member of the House, to examine and see whether the papers ought to be destroyed or not; and, if so, to authorize the Department to do it.

Mr. HALE. This is, of course, new to many of us. Let me ask the Senator if that provision of the statute has ever been carried out by the appointment of two members, one from each House?

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, time and again.

Mr. HALE. And upon the report of this joint committee useless documents have been destroyed?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes.

Mr. HALE. Is that going on now, from year to year?

Mr. COCKRELL. Only when a committee is appointed. The Department can not destroy the papers until a committee has been appointed and reports, and they are required to send a list of the documents to be destroyed.

Mr. HALE. My question is whether that committee has been appointed every year, from year to year.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is appointed every time there are any documents to be destroyed. It is only appointed for the given emergency. It is not a standing committee, or anything of that kind, but it is a committee to be appointed by the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate when a report comes in.

Mr. HALE. Does the Chair know when the last committee was appointed?

Mr. COCKRELL. I have served once or twice upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is hardly able to understand how there could be so many joint committees having jurisdiction of practically the same subject. There was one on the part of the Post-Office Department, of which Mr. PENROSE was chairman. There was one on the Library. One of these communications has been referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, another to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL. They ought all to go to one committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is what occurred to the Chair.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no question about that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All should go to one committee, but is there any such committee?

Mr. COCKRELL. Unless the Chair has appointed one, there is not. There is no permanent committee by law. The committee is constituted for the specific purpose of determining whether the papers reported are to be destroyed or not.

Mr. HALE. How does the matter come here now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is one communication from the Secretary of War and another communication from the Postmaster-General.

Mr. HALE. Relating to documents and papers that are said to be useless?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They are said to be useless.

Mr. HALE. I suggest that the communication for the present lie on the table.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will furnish the President of the Senate with a copy of the law in a few moments.

Mr. HALE. Then the Senator can furnish the Chair with a copy of the law and the procedure, so that a committee can be appointed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would like to know, if the committee is to be appointed, how long its life continues and whether there is to be one committee or whether there will be half a dozen committees, as there have been heretofore.

Mr. COCKRELL. There never has been, unless at this session, more than one committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will let the matter lie on the table for the present——

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes; I will hunt the matter up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Until the Senator may have time, or some one will have time, to look it up and see what should be done.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will look it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Petitions and memorials are in order.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PLATT of New York presented a petition of Laborers' Protective Union No. 7458, of Utica, N. Y., praying for the enactment of legislation regulating the hours of daily labor of mechanics and workmen, and also to protect free labor from prison competition; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of the keeper and crew of the life-saving station at Rockaway, New York, praying for the enactment of legislation to promote the efficiency of the Life-Saving Service and to encourage the saving of life from shipwreck; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of New York City; of Warren & Osgood, of Verona; and of sundry citizens of Westernville, Kennedy, Knowelhurst, Whallonsburg, Fillmore, Prattsville, and Willet, and of Local Grange No. 1, Patrons of Husbandry, of Fredonia, all in the State of New York, praying for the enactment of the so-called Grout bill, to regulate the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine; which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. McMILLAN presented a petition of sundry citizens of Pentwater, Mich.. praying for the enactment of legislation to promote the efficiency of the Life-Saving Service and to encourage the saving of life from shipwreck; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Federal Labor Union, of Port Huron, Mich., praying for the enactment of legislation to regulate the hours of daily work of laborers and mechanics, and also to protect free labor from prison competition; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented sundry petitions of citizens of Kalamazoo and Sanilac counties, in the State of Michigan, praying for the enactment of the so-called Grout bill, to regulate the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine; which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. FOSTER presented a petition of sundry citizens of the coal-mining districts of the State of Washington, praying for the enactment of legislation to regulate the hours of daily work of laborers and mechanics, and also to protect free labor from prison competition; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. QUARLES presented a petition of the Federated Trades Council, of Milwaukee, Wis., praying for the enactment of legislation to limit the hours of daily labor of workmen and mechanics, and also to protect free labor from prison competition; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of the keeper and life-saving crew at Kewaunee Station, Wis., praying for the enactment of legislation to promote the efficiency of the Life-Saving Service and to encourage the saving of life from shipwreck; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the faculty of the College of Engineering of the University of Wisconsin, praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the establishment of a national standardizing bureau; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented petitions of 11 citizens of Portage County, 45 citizens of Troy, and of 133 citizens, all in the State of Wisconsin, praying for the enactment of the so-called Grout bill, to regulate the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine; which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. NELSON presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis, Minn., praying for the repeal of the revenue stamp tax on checks, telegrams, contracts of sales, express receipts, etc.; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BURROWS presented memorials of sundry citizens of Ann Arbor, Mich., remonstrating against the alleged granting of permits to houses of ill fame in Manila; which was referred to the Committee on the Philippines.

Mr. HALE presented the petition of F. N. Palmer and sundry other citizens of Monroe, Me., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Bangor, Portland, Houlton, Bath, Gardiner, Presque Isle, Camden, Belfast, Guilford, Rumford Falls, Dover, and Foxcroft, all in the State of Maine, praying for the repeal of the revenue tax on bank checks; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DOLLIVER presented the petition of B. A. Lockwood and sundry other grain dealers of Des Moines, Iowa, praying for the repeal of the war-revenue tax on grain; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of sundry boiler makers and iron shipbuilders of Sioux City, Iowa, and a petition of the United Brotherhood of Leather Workers, of Boone, Iowa, praying for the enactment of legislation regulating the hours of daily labor of workmen and mechanics, and also to protect free labor from prison competition; which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Algona, Iowa, and a petition of sundry citizens of Fort Dodge, Iowa, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors to the native races in Africa; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented sundry petitions of citizens of Royal, Knoxville, Washta, Luana, Hobart, and Oneida, all in the State of Iowa, praying for the enactment of the so-called Grout bill, to regulate the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine; which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. KEAN presented sundry petitions of citizens of New Jersey, praying for the enactment of the so-called Grout bill, to regulate the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine; which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented sundry petitions of citizens of New Jersey, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in Army canteens; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. McLAURIN presented a petition of the Merchants' Exchange of Charleston, S. C., praying that the operations of the United States Geological Survey be extended so as to include the forests of South Carolina and the Eastern States; which was referred to the Committee on the Geological Survey.

He also presented a petition of the Merchants' Exchange of Charleston, S. C., praying for the establishment of a national forest reserve; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of the Merchants' Exchange of Charleston, S. C., praying that an appropriation be made for the improvement of the public roads of the country; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of the Merchants' Exchange of Charleston, S. C., praying that an appropriation be made to carry on the work of the Geological Survey relative to the water power of the country for manufacturing and other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on the Geological Survey.

Mr. KYLE presented a petition of the congregation of the Fire-steel Church, of Davison County, S. Dak., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors at any post exchange, transport, or canteen, or upon any premises used for military purposes by the United States; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Walworth County, S. Dak., praying that an appropriation be made for the construction and maintenance of an Indian industrial school at Evarts, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor of Elk Point, S. Dak., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the importation of intoxicating liquors into uncivilized countries; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a memorial of the Live Stock Exchange of South St. Joseph, Mo., remonstrating against the enactment of the so-called Grout bill, to regulate the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented the petition of Lars Berglund and 16 other citizens of Day County, S. Dak., praying for the enactment of the so-called Grout bill, to regulate the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. LODGE presented the petition of A. C. Stoddard and 22 other citizens of North Brookfield, Mass., praying for the enactment of the so-called Grout bill, to regulate the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of the Woman's Suffrage League of Natick, Mass., and a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Natick, Mass., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FAIRBANKS presented sundry petitions of citizens of Brunswick, Gaston, Parkes, New Trenton, Martinsburg, and Warrick County, all in the State of Indiana, praying for the enactment of the so-called Grout bill, to regulate the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine; which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Fort Wayne, Poe, and Hoagland, all in the State of Indiana, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SPOONER presented a petition of the faculty of the College of Engineering of the University of Wisconsin, praying for the establishment of a national standardizing bureau; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of Nelson Craite, keeper, and 6 other members of the life-saving station of Kewaunee, Wis., praying for the enactment of legislation to promote the efficiency of the Life-Saving Service and to encourage the saving of life from shipwreck; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BUTLER presented a petition of the Produce Exchange of Wilmington, N. C., and a petition of the Board of Trade of Asheville, N. C., praying for the establishment of a national forest reserve so as to include the forests of North Carolina and the Eastern States; which were referred to the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Asheville, N. C., and a petition of the Produce Exchange of Wilmington, N. C., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the enlargement of the work of the Geological Survey so as to include the mapping of the forest regions in the southern and eastern portions of the United States; which were referred to the Committee on the Geological Survey.

He also presented a petition of the Produce Exchange of Wilmington, N. C., praying that an appropriation be made to enable the Geological Survey to secure certain data concerning the depth and extent of artesian water supply in the malarial regions bordering on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts; which was referred to the Committee on the Geological Survey.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Asheville, N. C., praying that an appropriation be made to enable the Geological Survey to make a thorough examination of the surface streams of the Piedmont Plateau and the mountain regions of the Eastern States and of the artesian water supply in the South Atlantic and Gulf States; which was referred to the Committee on the Geological Survey.

He also presented a petition of the Produce Exchange of Wilmington, N. C., and a petition of the Board of Trade of Asheville, N. C., praying that an appropriation be made to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to examine into the question of the improvement of the public highways; which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented the petitions of Hodges M. Gallop, keeper, and 7 other members of the life-saving crew of Whales Head; of Thomas J. Tillett, keeper, and 7 other members of the life-saving crew of Currituck Inlet; of Dunbar Davis, keeper, and 7 other members of the life-saving crew of Oak Island; of Jim E. Ward, keeper, and 7 other members of the life-saving crew of Devil Hills; of James W. Howard, keeper, and 7 other members of the life-saving crew of Ocracoke; of Van Buren Etheridge, keeper, and 7 other members of the life-saving crew of Nags Head; of H. W. Stryan, keeper, and 7 other members of the life-saving crew of Creeds Hill; of D. M. Pugh, keeper, and 7 other members of the life-saving crew of Gull Shoal; of W. M. Etheridge, keeper, and 7 other members of the life-saving crew of Oregon Inlet; of William H. Gaskill, keeper, and 8 other members of the life-saving crew of Cape Lookout, and of John L. Watts, keeper, and 8 other members of the life-saving crew of Cape Fear, all in the State of North Carolina, praying for the enactment of legislation to promote the efficiency of the Life-Saving Service and to encourage the saving of life from shipwreck; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented petitions of 19 citizens of North Carolina, praying for the enactment of the so-called Grout bill, to regulate the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine; which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a memorial of the National Live-Stock Exchange, remonstrating against the enactment of the so-called Grout bill, to regulate the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present a joint resolution of the general assembly of Missouri, in favor of an appropriation for the repair and improvement of Galveston Harbor. I ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The joint resolution was read and referred to the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

STATE OF MISSOURI, SENATE CHAMBER,
City of Jefferson, January 11, 1901.

DEAR SIR: The senate of the Forty-first general assembly of Missouri on the 11th day of January, 1901, took up and adopted the following resolution:

"Joint resolution requesting our Senators and Representatives in Congress to cooperate with the Texas delegation in securing appropriations for the repair and improvement of Galveston Harbor.

"Whereas the city and port of Galveston in our sister State of Texas met with an appalling disaster in the storm and flood of September 8, 1900, resulting in loss of many thousands of lives and properties of the value of many millions of dollars; and

"Whereas the people of Missouri and of the Southwest and of the entire Union are deeply interested in the maintenance of the deep-water port on the Gulf of Mexico at Galveston: Therefore, be it

"Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring therein), That our Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States be requested to cooperate with the Texas Senators and Representatives in securing at the present session appropriations in the river and harbor bill for the repair and improvement of Galveston Harbor.

"Resolved further, That the clerk of the house transmit a copy of these resolutions to each Missouri Senator and Representative in Congress."

Respectfully submitted,

C. ROACH,
Secretary of the Missouri Senate.

Hon. FRANCIS M. COCKRELL,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. FRYE presented a petition of Shipwrights' Local Assembly No. 514, Knights of Labor, of Brooklyn, N. Y., praying for the passage of the so-called ship-subsidy bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Texas Division of the American Travelers' Protective Association, of Houston, Tex., praying for the establishment of a department of commerce and industries; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Wilton, Me., and the petition of T. E. Barton and 9 other citizens of Bethel, Me., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in Army canteens; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of F. L. Palmer and 38 other citizens of Monroe, J. Albert Jones and 29 other citizens of South China, and of Charles F. Johnson and 7 other citizens of South Bridgton, all in the State of Maine, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of J. C. Hohnan and 26 other citizens of Farmington, Joel Wilbur and 21 other citizens of Phillips, Charles E. Hyde and 34 other citizens of Bath, E. G. Hodgdon and 59 other citizens of Waterville, E. R. Spear and 46 other citizens of Rockland, Louis B. Goodall and 17 other citizens of Sanford, and of H. D. Bates and 47 other citizens of Waterville, all in the State of Maine, praying for the repeal of the revenue-stamp tax on bank checks; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

IRRIGATION FOR THE PIMA INDIANS.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I have a letter addressed to me from the Secretary of the Interior, inclosing a copy of that part of the report of Indian Inspector Walter H. Graves which relates to irrigation for the Pima Indians. I move that the letter and accompanying report be printed as a document.

The motion was agreed to.

CLERICAL ASSISTANCE FOR COURTS IN ALASKA.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5346) making provision for the employment of clerical assistance in the district of Alaska, to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask that it be now considered. It is very short.

The Secretary read the bill; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It provides that the provisions of section 15 of the act approved May 28, 1896, relative to the employment of clerical assistance by United States attorneys, shall hereafter apply to the district of Alaska; and any clerical assistant or assistants employed by the district attorney for any division of the district of Alaska since June 30, 1900, may be paid upon the approval of the Attorney-General.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. LUTIE M. NOWLIN.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 11008) authorizing the Solicitor of the Treasury to quitclaim and release certain title and interest of the United States to Mrs. Lutie M. Nowlin, to report it with an amendment, and also to ask for its present consideration.

Mr. MORGAN. Let the bill go to the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama objects.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me to state in thirty seconds——

Mr. MORGAN. At any proper time I will not object to calling up the bill from the Calendar, but I do object to its consideration in this way.

Mr. HOAR. It will take less time, if the Senator will allow me to make a brief statement now.

Mr. MORGAN. Very well.

Mr. HOAR. It is a case where the United States got a judgment for a thousand dollars and levied on the property of a wife down in Texas for the debt against her husband. The Solicitor-General is satisfied that the property is the wife's and that the Government can not hold it. It makes a cloud on the woman's title, and the bill simply authorizes the Solicitor-General, if in his discretion he thinks fit, to release it.

I suppose if this were any corporation, a bank or a railroad, and such a thing came up, the directors would say, "We refer that to the Solicitor, with power to act," and that is what we have done in this bill. That is the whole of it.

Mr. MORGAN. What I object to is the practice that committees of this body have got into here of making reports and asking immediate consideration. They have the floor for that purpose, of course, and it is not right to the rest of us that they should do it.

Mr. HOAR. There is hardly any other way in the closing hours of a session. This is a House bill, and the poor woman will lose her remedy unless we can get this little favor through right off. It is a bill which was drawn in the Department, and it was unanimously approved by the committee. Of course, if the Senator insists on his objection, I will not press it. I hope the Senator, under the circumstances, will allow it to go through.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, on page 2, line 4, to strike out the word "directed" and insert "in his discretion, if he thinks fit;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Solicitor of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, and in his discretion, if he thinks fit, to quitclaim and release to the said Mrs. Lutie M. Nowlin all right, title, and interest of the United States in and to the aforesaid lot and premises and the appurtenances and improvements thereunto belonging: Provided, That the aforesaid levy and sale shall not be taken or held to have operated as a satisfaction, in whole or in part, of said judgment, but said judgment shall stand as if the aforesaid levy and sale had not been made.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

REPORT ON ISTHMIAN CANAL.

Mr. MORGAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Interoceanic Canals to make an additional report and present a statement from Prof. Emory R. Johnson, of the Isthmian Canal Commission, on the commercial features of the canal. The report has been delayed in order to get the statement. It is a very important statement, one that interests every Senator on this floor, and I ask that it may be printed and lie on the table. I ask also that it may be printed in the RECORD as well as a document, because the country at large will have a universal interest in the statement made by Professor Johnson, who, I suppose, has no superior in point of authority in this country on subjects of a commercial character.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator's request include the report of the committee?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama reports from the Committee on Interoceanic Canals certain papers submitted by him to the Senate, which he asks unanimous consent may be printed as a document.

Mr. MORGAN. And also in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And also in the RECORD. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 1337, part 5, Fifty-sixth Congress, second session.]

The committee has delayed its report on the commercial features of the Nicaragua Canal in order to present the special statement of Mr. Emory R. Johnson, a member of the Isthmian Canal Commission, which is herewith submitted. The thorough researches of this acknowledged authority on commercial subjects are presented succinctly in this paper, with conclusions that are demonstrated with great force and precision.

This statement of the traffic resources of the canal and its effects upon the commerce and industries of the United States removes many doubts that have embarrassed the estimates of anxious but less informed inquirers, and presents in a clear, authentic, and reliable form the actual basis of correct calculation, and proves conclusively that as an investment the Nicaragua Canal will earn a highly remunerative profit on a cost of even $200,500,000, which is the extreme estimate of cost presented by the Isthmian Canal Commission.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, ISTHMIAN CANAL COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., January 11, 1901.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith a reply to the questions asked me in your letter of the 7th instant. The final report of the Isthmian Canal Commission will contain a full discussion of these and the other subjects connected with an adequate treatment of the value of the proposed waterway to the commerce and industries of the United States and other countries.

One of the questions you asked was concerning my academic position. I became a member of the faculty of the University of Pennsylvania in 1893, and since 1895 have held the position of assistant professor of transportation and commerce in that institution.

Very respectfully, yours,

EMORY R. JOHNSON,
Chairman Committee on Value of Canal.

Senator JOHN T. MORGAN,
Chairman Committee on Interoceanic Canals,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Reply submitted by Emory R. Johnson to questions asked by Senator JOHN T. MORGAN, concerning the traffic of an isthmian canal and of the Suez Canal and of the industrial effects which will result from the opening of an American interoceanic canal.

1. At what amount of tonnage do you estimate the vessels that will pass through the canal during the first year after it is completed and opened to traffic, and by what measurement do you ascertain the tonnage?

2. What increase of tonnage do you expect will pass through the canal in the tenth year after its completion?

3. Please give such data as you rely upon in reaching the conclusions you have stated, giving separately the countries from which the traffic will be derived.

4. In estimating the gross receipts of this canal, do you include any and what part of the traffic that has heretofore passed through the Suez Canal?

A partial reply to questions 1, 2, 3, and 4 is contained in certain paragraphs of the Preliminary Report of the Isthmian Canal Commission, submitted to the President on the 30th of November last. The paragraphs are as follows:

"To determine the amount of tonnage that would use a canal were it now in existence two distinct statistical investigations have been made. In one of these the exports and imports of the United States and of the leading commercial nations of Europe were studied for the purpose of ascertaining how many tons of cargo, or how much freight, those countries would now contribute to the traffic through an American interoceanic canal. The statistics of exports and imports of all countries being given either in values or quantities, it was necessary to convert these into their tonnage equivalents. This change having been made for each commodity, it was found that 3,420,752 cargo tons of the maritime commerce of the United States during the year ending June 30, 1899, could have used the canal to advantage. During the calendar year 1898 the trade of Europe with the west coast of South and Central America and British Columbia amounted to 3,346,377 cargo tons. The sum of these two amounts, 6,773,129 cargo or freight tons, does not include any of the trade between Europe and the Orient, a part of which would have used the American canal had it been in existence. The figures, moreover, apply to the commerce of the past carried on under the conditions then prevailing.

"The statistics of entrances and clearances show that the net register tonnage of the American and foreign shipping that would have passed through a canal had it existed during the year 1898-99 was 4,582,128 tons, in addition to a part of the commerce between Europe and the Orient. The opening of the American isthmian canal will accentuate the present tendency of traffic to follow round-the-world lines, and not less than one-fourth of the present traffic of Europe with Eastern countries may be expected to use this route. One-fourth of the vessel tonnage employed in the European-Oriental commerce during the calendar year 1898 amounted to 1,154,328 tons net, and this added to 4,582,128 gives a total of 5,736,456, the number of tons of shipping that would have used a canal had it been in existence in 1898-99.

"Records of vessel movements kept by the New Panama Canal Company show that the commerce between the east and west coasts of the American continent, and between Europe and the American west coast, would have caused an isthmian canal to be used by 3,848,577 tons, net, of shipping in 1899. This sum plus one-fourth of the vessel tonnage of the commerce between Europe and the East gives 5,126,890 tons net register for the traffic available in 1899. The difference between the result of the investigation made by the French company and that conducted by this commission is 609,536 tons. However, two-fifths of this difference is accounted for by the fact that the French statisticians did not include any tonnage for the trade carried on between the eastern half of the United States and foreign Pacific countries by way of our Pacific ports. The difference between the two totals may also be partly due to their not covering identical periods. The United States statistics of entrances and clearances studies by this commission were for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, whereas the French record of vessel movements was for the calendar year 1899. The similarity in the results of the two investigations is evidence of the essential accuracy of both.

"The increase during the decade preceding 1899 in the tonnage of the vessels that would have used the canal was 22.55 per cent. Upon the safe assumption that this rate of increase per decade will continue, the available canal tonnage of 1898, as calculated by the French statisticians, will have become 6,127,112 in 1908 and 6,922,166, or, in round numbers, 7,000,000, tons net register in 1914; that is, at the end of sixteen years. If the tonnage of the entrances and clearances of the available canal traffic of the year 1898-99, as determined by this commission's investigation (5,736,456 tons net register), be taken as the basis of estimate, an increase of 22.55 per cent per decade would make the figures for 1909 7,030,627 tons and for 1914 7,782,240 tons net register."

The conclusion reached by the traffic investigations conducted by the Isthmian Canal Commission is that about seven and a half million tons of traffic will be available for the canal in 1914 if the rate of increase for the past ten years be continued until that date. After the canal has been opened the traffic that will find the use of the canal desirable will increase much more rapidly than it is now growing. The tonnage of the Suez Canal increased 46 per cent from 1889 to 1899, and there are strong reasons for believing that the growth in the traffic of an American interoceanic canal during the first decade of its use will be fully as rapid as has been the case with the Suez Canal during the past decade. Everything points to a large increase in the commerce of the west coast of South America as the result of the opening of the canal, and also in the trade of the United States with her Pacific possessions and with Oceania and oriental countries. An increase of 50 per cent in the traffic of 1914 may safely be expected to take place during the ten years following that date. That would make the traffic of the isthmian canal 11,250,000 tons in 1924. I regard this as a conservative estimate.

5. What rate of toll per ton do you adopt as a maximum in estimating the gross income of the canal, and why do you adopt that rate?

In investigating the tonnage of the vessels that the existing commerce of the world would cause to pass through a canal it was not deemed necessary to adopt a rate of toll. A careful study has, however, been made of the effect which tolls would have upon the volume of business, and the general conclusion reached is that any toll greater than $1 per vessel ton, net register, would cause the greater part of the tonnage of the west coast of South America to pass through the Straits of Magellan instead of through an isthmian canal. This west-coast South American trade comprises, under present conditions, nearly one-third of the traffic available for the isthmian waterway. A toll that would divert this commerce from the canal would doubtless yield a lower gross revenue than would a toll of a dollar per ton, besides greatly restricting the industrial and commercial advantages of an interoceanic waterway.

6. What is the rate per ton that is charged upon vessels passing through the Suez Canal, say, in the years 1899 or 1900? What is the nominal rate; and if the actual rate is higher, by what method of measurement is that rate increased?

The tolls of the Suez Canal are 9 francs per ton on the net register of the vessel and 10 francs per passenger. The net register of the vessel is determined by rules peculiar to the Suez Canal, and as determined by those rules the net register of a ship is about one-seventh more than the registry would be if measured according to the rules followed by Great Britain and the United States. The present Suez Canal tolls would be equivalent to nearly $2 per net register ton as measured by British or American rules. Ships in ballast are charged 2½ francs per ton less than laden vessels, and certain other minor variations from the tariff are made for sailing vessels and tugs. The rules controlling the use of the Suez Canal are printed in full as Appendix M to the last report of the United States Commissioner of Navigation.

7. Please state the gross receipts of the Suez Canal each year since it was opened for traffic, and the countries from which the larger parts of the traffic have come that created such gross receipts.

The number of vessels that have passed through the Suez Canal each year since its opening, the gross and net tonnage, the average net tonnage per vessel, and the amount received in tolls are shown by the following table, No. 1, which is taken from a publication of the British Government, entitled "Tables Showing the Progress of Merchant Shipping," printed June 19, 1900. A table is also appended showing the division of this traffic among the vessels of the various nations of the world whose ships pass the waterway. The following tables and analysis of Table No. 1, in regard to the traffic and toll receipts, show several interesting facts.

NOTE.—The above figures include not only merchant vessels and mail steamers, but also war ships and transports, as well as Government chartered vessels.

Since 1885 there has been practically no increase in the number of vessels passing the canal. The large development of tonnage during that period has been the result of the increase in the average size of vessels, and not in the number of ships. The mean net register of the vessels using the Suez Canal will very soon reach 3,000 tons. Should the present rate of increase continue until 1914, the vessels will then average 3,600 tons net, and it is probable that the larger dimensions about to be given the Suez Canal will result in a more rapid increase in the size of vessels than is now taking place.

A comparison of the growth of tonnage by five-year periods, beginning with 1874, by which time the traffic through the waterway had grown to considerable proportions, shows that, as compared with the five-year period ending in 1878, the subsequent quinquennial period showed an increase of 96 per cent. For the five years 1884 to 1888, inclusive, the tonnage was 294 per cent; the quinquennial period ending in 1893 had an aggregate tonnage of 363 per cent, and the five-year period ending in 1898 an aggregate traffic of 409 per cent of that which passed the canal during the five-year period ending in 1878. That is to say, during twenty years the traffic increased fourfold.

A study of the growth of receipts from tolls shows that the receipts of 1881 were more than double those of 1874, and those of 1891 were three times those of 1874, and those of 1899 were 3.7 times those twenty-five years earlier. Table II shows in detail the division of the traffic among the shipping of the various countries. It will be seen from this table that 75 per cent of the total Suez Canal shipping in 1892 was under the British flag. By 1898 this had fallen to 66 per cent, and in 1899 it was 64 per cent.

The growth in the tonnage using the Suez Canal and the growth in the size of ships is graphically shown by the following diagrams [omitted] taken from a printed address delivered by Sir Charles Hartley on the history of the engineering works of the Suez Canal before the Institution of Civil Engineers, London, March 13, 1900. This table has been brought down to date by the addition of the figures for 1899.

The larger share of the traffic through the Suez Canal is that carried on by Great Britain, Germany, and the Netherlands with India, the East Indies, and the Orient. The statistics of the Suez Canal traffic are not given in such a way as to enable one to determine accurately the distribution of the traffic of this waterway among the various nations whose trade passes through the canal. All the commercial nations of the North Atlantic, including our own country, trade by way of the canal with Australia, Oceanica, and southern and eastern Asia.

8. In any statement you make as to the extent of your researches, please to name the manufacturing, mining, and larger shipping centers you have visited, and state any facts that will tend to show the present and prospective commercial importance of those places.

The industrial and commercial investigations conducted by the committee on the value of the canal have consisted in part of a study of the commercial statistics of the United States and foreign countries, and in part of a careful investigation of the industries and trade of the different sections of the United States and the more important foreign countries that would make use of the canal. In securing information regarding foreign countries the State Department assisted us by sending a letter of inquiry to American consuls, and another letter to American ministers resident in those countries whose trade it was thought desirable to study. To secure data in regard to the business interests of different parts of the United States, an extensive correspondence has been conducted with business men in all parts of the country.

The commercial organizations in all the larger cities have been requested to make special reports to the Isthmian Canal Commission, giving information in regard to the industries and foreign trade of their respective cities, and the use which their members would make of the proposed waterway. Personal visits have been made by one or more members of the committee on the value of the canal to 27 large commercial and industrial cities. The larger seaboard cities of the Atlantic and Gulf have been visited, also such centers of the iron and steel industries as Pittsburg, Cleveland, Chattanooga, and Birmingham. Visits were also made to the industrial cities of Atlanta, Memphis, Louisville, St. Louis, Indianapolis, Cincinnati, Chicago, Milwaukee, and Detroit. Wherever the committee went the business organizations manifested a very keen interest in the early construction of the canal. The commercial organizations and the business men have shown their interest in the canal project by giving the committee on the value of the canal all the assistance that lay within their power.

Wherever the committee went it was impressed by the ability of American manufacturers to produce economically and on a large scale. The efforts to secure foreign trade are being put forth quite as much by the people of the inland industrial centers as by those at or near the seaboard. Possibly the keenest interest in the interoceanic canal is felt in such sections as the Pittsburg (Pa.) and the Birmingham (Ala.) districts, where the mining of coal and the manufacture of iron and steel products for export have already acquired large proportions. No one can visit these and the other great industrial sections of the United States without realizing that such a reduction in the costs of reaching foreign markets as will be accomplished by the isthmian canal will effect a large increase in our foreign trade.

9. Please to state whether or not, in your opinion, a ship canal through the Isthmus of Darien would increase the population and develop the industries of the States on or near the Pacific coast of the United States, and whether it would benefit or depress the traffic of the railways that have terminals on that coast.

The final report which is now being prepared will contain a section discussing the relation of the canal to the industries of the Pacific coast States. Some of the conclusions that have been reached may be stated as follows: The Pacific coast States are the most geographically isolated portion of our country. The chief markets of this section in the past have been the countries of the North Atlantic, and such will for a long time continue to be the case.

The existing means of transportation by rail across the continent, or by water around South America, are the great hindrances to the development of that trade. Moreover, there are other sections of the world that are becoming increasingly strong competitors with our west coast in the production of grain, fruits, and wine. The most general statement that can be made of the effect which the isthmian canal will have on the Pacific coast is that the waterway will enable that section to meet more easily and successfully the growing competition of those countries whose similar productions make them commercial rivals of our Western States. Without an isthmian canal our west coast will have difficulty in meeting the competition of these rival sections, but with the waterway our Pacific States will easily hold their own in the international industrial struggle.

A careful study of the probable effect which the isthmian canal will have upon the business of American railways, and the information received by numerous interviews with railway officials having intimate knowledge of traffic affairs, leads to the general conclusion that the proximate effect of the isthmian canal in compelling a reduction and readjustment of the rates on that share of the trans-continental railway business that will be subject to the competition of the new water route will be more than offset by the ultimate and not distant expansion of the through and local traffic that must necessarily be handled by rail. The increase in the population of the country and the growth in our home and foreign trade will early demonstrate the need of the transportation services of both the canal and the railways.

10. Please state whether or not the opening of the Suez Canal has benefited the commerce of the Western Hemisphere or of the world, and, approximately, the extent thereof:

The benefit which the Suez Canal has been to the commerce of the Eastern Hemisphere is in part indicated by the large volume of traffic that now uses the waterway. Only a small part of this consists of traffic originating or terminating in the Western Hemisphere. The development of the great trade which Europe has with India, the East Indies, and the Orient has largely been made possible by the Suez Canal. It is questionable whether the Suez Canal has been a benefit to the Western Hemisphere. It has given Europe a decided advantage over the United States for securing the large and growing commerce of the Pacific countries. The presence of the Suez Canal without the existence of an American isthmian waterway places the United States and other countries of the Western Hemisphere in a disadvantageous position as contrasted with Europe.

COURTS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. THURSTON. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10498) to create a new division in the western judicial district of the State of Missouri, to report it with amendments.

I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

PAYMENT OF STENOGRAPHERS.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. PRITCHARD on the 10th instant, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the stenographer employed to report the hearing before the Committee on Patents on the bill (S. 5089) for the relief of the widow of Isaiah Smith Hyatt be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. PROCTOR on the 10th instant, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the stenographer employed to report the hearings before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry upon House bill 3717, known as the oleomargarine bill, be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

BRANDY DISTILLED FROM CHERRIES.

Mr. ALLISON. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 12281) to amend section 3255 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, concerning the distilling of brandy from fruits, to report it with an amendment. As it is a brief bill and proposes only a single amendment of the law, I ask that it may be considered. It will take but a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read in full to the Senate for its information.

The Secretary read the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with an amendment, in line 10, after the word "prunes," to insert the word "figs," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3255 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3255. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may exempt distillers of brandy made exclusively from apples, peaches, grapes, pears, pineapples, oranges, apricots, berries, prunes, figs, or cherries from any provision of this title relating to the manufacture of spirits, except as to the tax thereon, when in his judgment it may seem expedient to do so."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to hear the report read.

Mr. ALLISON. There is no report submitted. I will say to the Senator that this is the exact law now, except that the bill as it came from the other House provides for cherries, and the Senate Committee on Finance proposes to insert in addition to that amendment the word "figs." It is a matter relating to fruits in California. I hope the Senator will not object to the bill.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to hear from the Senator from California on the subject.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from California will, I have no doubt, make a very satisfactory explanation of the measure.

Mr. PERKINS. The distinguished Senator from Iowa, from the Committee on Finance, has explained the bill, I am sure, satisfactorily to my friend from South Dakota. The bill simply gives the horticulturists of California an opportunity to make a temperance drink from the syrup of figs.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like also to know the effect of the other amendment. I do not know that they grow cherries in California or in Iowa.

Mr. PERKINS. Cherries grow in California in great profusion. It is the first State in the Union, I think, in producing the best quality of cherries. The same argument applies that can be used in favor of figs. It was unanimously reported favorably by the committee in the other House, who carefully considered the subject-matter; and knowing what Cherry Pectoral, which is also useful in certain diseases, is, the bill was unanimously reported favorably. I am sure my friend from South Dakota will not object to it when he understands that we will give him cuttings from our cherry and fig trees, that they may be planted in South Dakota.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I shall have to object to the consideration of the bill, because there is no proof that these are temperance drinks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota objects. The bill goes to the Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PETTIGREW introduced a bill (S. 5556) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to purchase 2,000 copies of Ups and Downs of an Army Officer, by Col. George A. Armes, United States Army, retired; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FAIRBANKS introduced a bill (S. 5557) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of Edward Whelan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5558) for the relief of Jackson Foster; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. KYLE introduced a bill (S. 5559) granting an increase of pension to Adolphus Richardson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5560) granting an increase of pension to J. W. Harden; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. KYLE (for Mr. ALLEN) introduced a bill (S. 5561) for the relief of Florine A. Albright; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 5562) granting an increase of pension to Mary Taylor; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. COCKRELL. To accompany that bill I present the petition of Mrs. Mary Taylor, widow of Lewis Taylor, captain Company G, Forty-fifth Regiment, Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and the affidavits of Robert I. Stickney, John H. White, and Drs. George D. Coe and E. J. Burch. I move that the bill and accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 5563) granting an increase of pension to Samuel J. Boyer; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. COCKRELL. To accompany that bill I present the petition of Samuel J. Boyer, Company G, Nineteenth Regiment United States Infantry, and the affidavits of William M. Russell and Lewis Schmidt. I move that the bill and accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McENERY introduced a bill (S. 5564) for the relief of Robert Norris; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BAKER introduced a bill (S. 5565) to apportion the lands and funds of the Osage tribe of Indians, in the Territory of Oklahoma, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 5566) granting a pension to Eliza B. Gamble; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BACON introduced a bill (S. 5567) for the relief of E. H. Abercrombie; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. NELSON introduced a bill (S. 5568) to authorize the restatement, readjustment, settlement, and payment of dues to Army officers in certain cases; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HALE introduced a bill (S. 5569) granting an increase of pension to George W. Taylor; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McCOMAS introduced a bill (S. 5570) granting a pension to Henry Miller; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WARREN introduced a bill (S. 5571) for the relief of John A. Lockwood; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. THURSTON introduced a bill (S. 5572) providing for an additional circuit judge in the Eighth judicial circuit; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHOUP introduced a bill (S. 5573) to amend section 203 of Title III of the act entitled "An act making further provisions for a civil government for Alaska, and for other purposes;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Territories.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. HOAR submitted an amendment proposing to increase the salaries of the Chief Justice and associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, of the circuit judges of the United States, of the district judges of the United States, and of the judges of the Court of Claims of the United States, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOAR subsequently, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported the above amendment favorably, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. TURNER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $402.26 to pay the interest on the adjudicated claim of Patrick Henry Winston, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MALLORY submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $150,000 for the construction of a seagoing suction dredge to be used in improving the harbors of Pensacola, Carrabelle, and Apalachicola, Fla., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for continuing improvement of the Choctawhatchee River, Florida, from $15,000 to $25,000, and providing that $10,000 of said amount shall be used for dredging a channel of 10 feet at the Cypress Top outlet of the said river, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ELKINS submitted an amendment proposing to increase the salaries of the clerk to the Secretary of the Treasury, clerk to the Secretary of War, and private secretary to the Postmaster-General from $2,250 each per annum to $2,400, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to increase the salaries of the private secretary to the Secretary of State, the clerk to the Secretary of the Navy, the private secretary to the Secretary of the Interior, and the private secretary to the Attorney-General from $2,250 each per annum to $2,400, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment providing for a preliminary survey of Little Harbor, Woods Hole, Mass., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to examine and adjudicate all claims of citizens of the United States against Spain, in accordance with the terms of the seventh article of the treaty concluded between the United States and Spain on the 10th day of December, 1898, intended to be proposed by him to the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. THURSTON submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $5,000 for repairing the bridges and approaches of the Winnebago Indian Agency, in the State of Nebraska, intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McCOMAS submitted an amendment proposing that hereafter the salary of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court shall be $15,500 per year, and that of each of the associate justices thereof shall be $15,000 per year; to each of the circuit judges $9,000; to each of the district judges $7,500; to the chief justice of the court of appeals of the District of Columbia $8,500 a year; to each of the associate justices thereof $8,000 a year; to the chief justice and each of the associate justices of the supreme court of the District of Columbia $7,500 per year, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TOWNE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $132,590.67 to reimburse the city of Duluth, Minn., for moneys expended in and about the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on the harbor of Duluth in 1870, 1871, and 1872, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

EXTENSION OF VERMONT AVENUE.

Mr. MONEY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2265) for the extension of Vermont avenue; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

IRRIGATION INVESTIGATION IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. PERKINS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and hereby is, directed to transmit to the Senate the results of the cooperative irrigation investigations made in the State of California by the Department of Agriculture and the California Water and Forestry Association.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on this day approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 92) granting a pension to William M. Ferry;

An act (S. 244) granting a pension to Mary Jane McLaughlin;

An act (S. 712) granting a pension to Nellie L. Groshon;

An act (S. 1245) granting a pension to Oliver Domon;

An act (S. 173) granting an increase of pension to John H. Morrison;

An act (S. 218) granting an increase of pension to Sarah E. Tate;

An act (S. 262) granting an increase of pension to Charles H. Irvin;

An act (S. 751) granting an increase of pension to Mathew T. Jones;

An act (S. 1347) granting an increase of pension to Marie Sharpe; and

An act (S. 1348) granting an increase of pension to Eliza M. Stillman.

COURTS IN WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 953) to divide the State of West Virginia into two judicial districts.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, I am unwilling that the bill shall be considered at the present time. I object to it now. I want time to look into it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the bill will retain its place on the Calendar.

EDWARD W. NORTONI.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Committee on Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 478) to increase the pension of Edward W. Nortoni, and that it be indefinitely postponed, because the beneficiary is dead.

The motion was agreed to.

THOMAS J. REID.

Mr. COCKRELL. I also move that the Committee on Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 520) granting a pension to Thomas J. Reid, and that it be indefinitely postponed, he also having deceased.

The motion was agreed to.

W. W. WHEELER.

Mr. COCKRELL. I also move that the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 448) to permit W. W. Wheeler to prosecute a claim. It is not the bill that was intended for consideration, but the bill (S. 553) to authorize W. W. Wheeler to prosecute a claim is the proper bill to be considered.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORT OF POSTAL COMMISSION.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, I desire to present, on behalf of the commission appointed by Congress to investigate certain questions of the postal service, including railway mail pay, the report of the commission, which consists of a main report with three or four additional reports by individual members of the commission, all included in one document, which I file.

I shall ask that the report may lie on the table and that an order may be made for the printing of a certain number of copies of the report, of which a certain number shall be for the use of the Senate and the others for the use of the House. This I will present later.

In submitting the report I will state to the Senate that under the law it was to have been filed upon the 1st of January, and that it was ready to be filed at that time, but illness has prevented its being earlier presented to this body.

Mr. BUTLER. My attention was diverted at the moment the Senator began his remarks. May I ask if this is the report of the Postal Commission?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. It is the final report?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. And the Senator now asks to have it all printed together? It has been printed in installments, I believe.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The evidence was printed under the law long ago.

Mr. BUTLER. This is the report?

Mr. WOLCOTT. This is the report.

Mr. BUTLER. The evidence was printed in detached volumes. Has it all been put together?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Everything has been done. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That there shall be printed 2,000 copies of the report of the Railway Mail Pay Commission.

I am informed a similar resolution has been offered in the House and that the House will provide for its own printing of the document. I suggest 2,000 copies of the report for the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator think that that is a large enough number? There will be great demand all over the country for the document. I should think that the number ought to be 3,000.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I will amend the resolution by increasing the number to 3,000 copies.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be received, and at the request of the Senator from Colorado it will lie on the table. The Senator from Colorado offers a resolution, which will be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That there shall be printed 3,000 copies of the report of the Railway Mail Pay Commission.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I wish to state further to the Senate that in the meetings of the commission we have been deprived of the presence of one member of the commission, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER]; and I desire to say, though without authority to do so, that it is very possible that that Senator may find it his duty to file later some further report or some individual views upon this subject, which may be presented to the Senate in due course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate agree to the resolution?

The resolution was agreed to.

PETITION OF FILIPINOS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a former day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. TELLER on the 10th instant, as follows:

Ordered, That the petition of certain inhabitants of the Philippine Islands, which has to-day been read in the Senate, be printed as a document, together with the names of the signers.

Mr. HAWLEY. On consultation with my colleague and neighbor, he kindly agrees that the resolution may go over, holding its place.

Mr. TELLER. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has asked me if I would allow him to have the resolution passed over to-day, retaining its place on the table, and I have assented to that course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request made that the resolution be passed over for the present, retaining its place? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

STATIONERY ROOM OF THE SENATE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the resolution submitted by Mr. MORGAN on the 11th instant; which was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate shall have the control of the officers of the stationery room of the Senate so as to inquire into and, from time to time, to report upon the conduct thereof.

Mr. SPOONER. I move the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. MORGAN. That is right. I have no objection to the reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The motion was agreed to.

THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Army bill.

There being no objection, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4300) to increase the efficiency of the military establishment of the United States, the pending question being on the amendment submitted by Mr. BACON, on page 12, section 2, line 17, after the word "authorized" to strike out:

Provided, That the President, in his discretion, may increase the number of corporals in any troop of cavalry to 8, and the number of privates to 76.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, there are three amendments offered by myself, identical in terms, each designed to accomplish the same purpose, and each relating to different branches of the subject—one to the cavalry, one to the artillery, and one to the infantry. If consistent with the views of the Chair, I will suggest that possibly the three amendments may be acted upon at the same time.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am extremely anxious to hear what the Senator is saying, but I can not hear him, either because his voice is insufficient or the noise in the Chamber is so great.

Mr. BACON. I will repeat that there are three amendments offered by me, one of which has been read, each of the three designed to accomplish the same purpose, but each relating to a different branch of the service—one to the artillery, one to the cavalry, and one to the infantry. My suggestion was that possibly, in the interest of time, it might be, though not strictly in accordance with the ordinary procedure, that the three might be acted upon at once.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have yet to learn what the purpose or the motive of the Senator is, or what is the necessity for his amendment.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I have no objection if the Senator prefers to proceed in detail. I simply proposed to act upon the three amendments at the same time, as they are all identical.

Mr. HAWLEY. Why act upon them at all? That is my question.

Mr. BACON. I did not understand the inquiry of the Senator.

Mr. President, I endeavored on Friday, when this matter was last before the Senate, to indicate the ground of my objection. My objection is that it is not necessary that this amendment of the committee should be in the bill in order that the President should have the authority to enlist the maximum number. The objection that I have to this portion of the bill, as I endeavored to state a little more in detail on Friday last than I feel justified in now repeating, is that I am opposed to that feature of the bill which puts it in the power of the President of the United States, in his own discretion, at any time when he might think proper, by his simple order to add 50,000 men to the Army of the United States. I say, Mr. President, that is utterly opposed to the spirit of our institutions, that it is an invasion of the prerogatives of the Congress of the United States, and that it should never be voluntarily enacted by Congress as law.

Mr. President, I do not desire to repeat what I have already said. I presume the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] was in the Chamber on Friday last, when I addressed the Senate upon this subject; but I will add one word. The history of the decadence of legislative power, the history of the increase of executive power, is generally the history found in usurpations by the executive, and is rarely found in the history of the voluntary surrender by a legislative body of the power which it possesses.

I assert, Mr. President—and if I am in error I think it is a matter of sufficient importance to challenge the attention of Senators and to evoke from them suggestions which may show the incorrectness of my position—I assert that not only the letter of the Constitution, but the spirit of the Constitution and the intention of the Constitution is that the question of the size of the Army shall be determined by the Congress of the United States, and not by the Executive. I say from the foundation of the Government to the present time that has been the spirit of our law, the genius of our institutions, and it would be the most radical departure from the practice and the principles of a hundred years if we should turn the matter over to the Executive and say it shall be within his discretion and within his power, without any suggestion or without any further authority from the Congress of the United States, at any time to add 50,000 men to the number of the Army of the United States.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator just take a few off that number of 50,000—say, 49,000?

Mr. BACON. I will if it will be any gratification to the Senator; but I do not see how that suggestion rises to the dignity of this occasion. I do not see how a suggestion so frivolous as that comports with the gravity of the issue we are met with to-day. It is no light question, Mr. President; but I will say to the Senator it is a question that is not going to be decided by the passage of this bill. I presume there is a determination on the part of the majority to pass this bill. They have the power to do it in this House and in the other House; and I presume from what has been said and done that it is the intention to surrender this power which the Constitution puts in Congress, and to confer it upon the Executive.

There is a greater question in it than the mere question of the relative power of the legislative and of the executive departments of the Government. It is a question which relates to the preservation of that which has been won by our race in hundreds of years of conflict and of sacrifice, and if Senators think that the passage of this bill is going to work this revolution in the institutions of this country and that no more is to be heard from it they are mistaken.

Mr. President, the people have not yet waked up to and do not realize the enormity of this proposition, but they will do it; and I do not believe that the American people, whenever they come to realize and to appreciate the fact that the proposition is to put it in the power of the Executive to say whether or not 50,000 men shall be added to the size of the Army, will ever indorse it or that they will ever sustain such legislation.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator permit me a question?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. Do I understand the Senator to say that, unless his amendment is adopted, under this bill hereafter, in case the Army should be reduced to a minimum, when the emergency is passed the President would have the power, without authority from Congress, to raise that number of the Army to a greater number?

Mr. BACON. I mean to say, in response to the inquiry of the Senator from Arkansas, that the language is susceptible of that construction, and that the party in power has announced on the floor of the Senate that that is the construction they put upon it.

Mr. BERRY. One other question. Will the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia make it clear that that can not be done?

Mr. BACON. I think it will, and that is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. BERRY. I hope the Senator will so frame his amendment that there will be no doubt upon the subject. I understood the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] on Friday to say that the bill did not confer that power, or that he was afraid it did not, but would be glad if it did. It seems to me that the Senator from Georgia should make his amendment so clear and so specific that all the world would understand that the President has no such power, because certainly such power ought not to be granted to any President of the United States.

Mr. BACON. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will say only a word, and then I will leave the matter to the Senate. This bill has been most laboriously perfected by the aid of the best soldiers in the Army, and it was supposed to be as good as it could be made. I do not like to see these small amendments adopted; but I am not afraid of 4 or 5 corporals in the cavalry, a few more men in the artillery, and a few more enlisted men in the infantry.

Mr. BACON. The Senator well knows that this particular clause is the clause by which, in the exercise of this power by the President of the United States, the aggregate number of the Army will be raised from the minimum of fifty-odd thousand to the maximum of 98,000; and he talks about 3 or 4 corporals and a few dozen men.

Mr. TELLER. One hundred and eight thousand men.

Mr. BACON. One hundred and eight thousand men.

Mr. TELLER. I want to say that I think a careful examination will show at least 100,000 men, or about 108,000.

Mr. BACON. That being the case, it is not such a trivial proposition as the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] would have us understand. It is not a question of the addition of a few men.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. FORAKER. There must be some mistake, or, if not, I do not understand this bill. I do not know where it is found that the bill provides for a maximum of 108,000. There is an express provision in one of the last clauses to the effect that it shall not exceed 100,000.

Mr. TELLER. Where?

Mr. FORAKER. On page 44 of the print I have in my hand, at the close of the first paragraph on that page, this is the language of the bill:

> The total number of enlisted men in said native organizations shall not exceed 12,000, and the total enlisted force of the line of the Army, together with such native force, shall not exceed at any one time 100,000.

Mr. TELLER. There is such a provision there, but it is contrary to other provisions. If the President should carry out the power that is given to him, you would find on examination that the Army would exceed 100,000.

Mr. FORAKER. I have not made any computation, but I rely upon——

Mr. TELLER. It is possible that the last provision might govern the former.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to interrupt him for just a moment further?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. It seems to me the effect of the Senator's amendment, if adopted, would be to make the maximum of the Army 54,000 or 58,000, whichever number is the aggregate computation. I have not made any computation, but rely simply upon the statements of others as to what the computation shows. There would be no power anywhere, either now or hereafter, except only that of Congress, to increase the Army. We would have a fixed provision as to the size of the Army, both as to its maximum and its minimum, and there would be no elasticity or flexibility in it whatever.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Ohio is quite correct. The matter was brought to the attention of the Senate on Friday last to the same effect he now states, and it was then suggested by me that if this section were stricken out—and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] will remember that he raised the same point on Friday that was suggested by me—the friends of the measure who favored a maximum of 98,000 could very easily insert a clause following the clause immediately preceding, which would fix the maximum in the same way as the clause preceding it would fix the minimum. That is not inconsistent with the striking out of this clause.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me to ask him another question, I will not interrupt him again, because they all go together.

Mr. BACON. I yield to the Senator with pleasure.

Mr. FORAKER. Would not the effect of the amendment of the Senator, if adopted, be not only to destroy the maximum, but to make the minimum the maximum? Would not the maximum fixed by this bill be also destroyed by the effect of the provision, if adopted, on page 40, line 15, section 26 as renumbered, which reads as follows:

> That the President is authorized to maintain the enlisted force of the several organizations of the Army at their maximum strength as fixed by this act during the present exigencies of the service or until such time as Congress may hereafter direct.

I do not intend to vote for any of the amendments offered by the Senator. I think the flexible feature of this bill is one of its best features. It enables us to maintain a minimum in time of peace and a maximum when there is a necessity for it; and it enables us to increase or decrease one or the other arm of the service as there may be, or not, occasion for one or the other to be increased or decreased. But if the amendment should be adopted at all, I call the Senator's attention to the fact that it ought also to remain as to that part of the bill providing that the maximum shall be 100,000; and there ought to be some amendment to section 26. In other words, the amendment would be entirely inconsistent with the rest of the bill.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. PROCTOR. Will the Senator allow me a word?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. PROCTOR. Section 26, if language means anything, in my view plainly covers every one of these organizations and limits the power of the President to increase to the maximum every one of these separate organizations "during the present exigencies of the service." The language limits his power to maintain the enlisted force of the several arms of the service, and that means the cavalry, the infantry, and the artillery, of course.

Mr. BACON. If Senators on the other side of the Chamber agree with the Senator from Vermont, I will withdraw the amendment, because, while I do not favor the proposition that it shall be within the discretion of the President to increase the Army, I recognize the fact that under the present emergency the number which would be enlisted promptly would be the maximum number, and if the view taken by the Senator from Vermont is correct, that, when maximum has once been reached and has thereafter been decreased to the minimum, the power to increase would be exhausted. If that is the view of the Senator, and if other Senators agree with it, that would be satisfactory so far as that provision is concerned.

But I am not in favor of the maximum number except for temporary purposes. At the same time there would be no reason to move to strike out those provisions. So if the Senator will secure from his side of the Chamber support of an amendment which will distinctly and expressly negative the power of the President when this Army has once been decreased to its minimum, thereafter, in his discretion, to increase it, I will not press my amendment. But if the Senator from Vermont has not the concurrence of his colleagues on the other side of the Chamber in that proposition, then there comes up what is to me the great enormity of the bill, which is not the view taken of it by the Senator from Vermont, that this is a power given to the President not to be exercised only once during this emergency, but that, according to the suggestions and contentions of his colleagues on the other side of the Chamber, it is a power to remain, and to be a continuing power so long as this act remains upon the statute books, which will enable the President at any time, in his judgment, in his discretion, without limitation, without question, without control from anyone, to increase the Army from 50,000 to 98,000, if you please. I do not know whether either the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] or the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] is correct in his computation as to what is the maximum, but 98,000 is sufficient for the purposes of this argument.

Mr. BURROWS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. BURROWS. How is it possible to convert the expression "during the present exigencies" into "any exigency?"

Mr. BACON. The Senator is quite correct; and if that were the only section there would be no doubt about it; but when these three other clauses, against which my amendments are directed, give the unlimited power, and when Senators, and numbers of them, on the other side of the Chamber say that this is to be a continuing power, are we to leave that in doubt?

Let the Senators who say that support the amendment offered—and I think they should if they do not offer it themselves—support an amendment distinctly negativing the power of the President to increase the Army after the present emergency, and I will not press these amendments.

But one of two things ought to be done, Mr. President. Either these three clauses in the bill which confer absolute, unlimited power, so far as they are concerned, upon the President ought to be taken out of the bill, or else the question raised by Senators should be settled by a distinct provision negativing the continuance of that power.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, on the first day this bill was up for discussion the Senator from Arkansas and other Senators, and I think the Senator from Georgia, objected to the last clause of the first sentence of section 26, "or until such time as Congress may hereafter direct." That was intended as a limitation; but if Senators understand it otherwise, there is no objection to striking it out.

Mr. BACON. No; striking that out does not meet the question with me.

Mr. PROCTOR. The Senator from Arkansas, I recollect, for one understands it differently from that.

Mr. BACON. That may remove one objection; but it would not remove the particular objection to which I have referred.

Mr. PROCTOR. I do not see how language can be any plainer than this is in the limitation of the enlisted force of the several organizations in the Army to their maximum strength "during the present exigencies of the service." I should like to ask if it would help the Senator if the words were inserted in each one of these several provisions, "during the present exigencies of the service." Would that satisfy him?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the Senator now puts the question in language to which I would not be willing to give my unlimited consent as to whether that would be satisfactory or not. I will say, though, that the bill would then be relieved of the feature of greatest objection to me, which is, as I understand, the continuing power of the President, and it would make it unnecessary that I should ask any vote upon these amendments. If the Senator will offer those amendments, or permit those amendments, inserting in each of those three places the same words found in section 26, while of course I do not yield the proposition that the power ought never to be given to the President, still that is the theory of this bill, and if it is properly guarded I shall not make any further effort to strike out those provisions.

Mr. PROCTOR. The Senator will see that it is necessary to have these three provisions under each of these heads in each of the corps of the service, for the reason that it may be consistent to reduce one of them. The infantry might be reduced, while the cavalry would be required to be at the maximum for a longer term. So the Senator can see there is a very good reason for inserting this provision.

Mr. BACON. If I may have the attention of the Senator from Vermont for a moment——

Mr. PROCTOR. The chairman of the committee [Mr. HAWLEY] agrees with me that there is no objection to inserting the words suggested in the places referred to.

Mr. BACON. In lieu of my amendments, then, which I have pending, I will ask that in line 14, on page 16, after the word "discretion," there may be inserted the same words as are found on page 40, section 16, "during the present exigencies of the service," so as to read:

That the President, in his discretion, during the present exigencies of the service, may increase, etc.

Mr. President, I offer that amendment to come in in each one of the sections to which I have referred. Of course, in offering it the Senate will not understand me as giving up the proposition that the President ought not to have the power to increase the Army at all, but to relieve that particular feature of the objection against which my amendment is directed I offer these amendments in the place of the others.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia withdraw the amendment pending and offer another?

Mr. BACON. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment now submitted by the Senator from Georgia will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the former amendment offered by Mr. BACON it is proposed to amend, in line 17, on page 12, after the word "President," by inserting the words "during the present exigencies of the service;" so as to read:

Provided, That the President during the present exigencies of the service, in his discretion, may increase the number of corporals in any troop of cavalry to eight, etc.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Georgia a question. As I understand from the amendment to which the Senator has last consented, he now considers that there is an emergency for the increase of the Army to the maximum?

Mr. BACON. Nothing that I have said or that I could possibly say could be construed into any consent by me to an increase of the Regular Army to the maximum proposed. On the contrary, everything I have said has been to protest against it. While, of course, we are endeavoring to assist in relieving the bill of the features which are objectionable, so far as we can, in no manner am I committed to consent to the suggestion of the inquiry made by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY].

I think that the standing army ought not be increased to 100,000 men. I think that the utmost limit of it ought to be the standing army that existed prior to a few years ago, with the addition of 5,000 men, which are deemed to be necessary to properly man the seacoast defenses, which was passed upon by the Senate at the last session in the enactment of the original bill for the reorganization of the Army. To that extent I am willing to go, but no further.

I think, so far as the present emergency is concerned, it ought to be met in one of two ways. It might be met by the organization of an army especially designed for that foreign service, which should be an army separate from our permanent military establishment. I should very much prefer to see that plan adopted. That might not in any manner threaten a change in the regular practice, the recognized practice and principles of this Government for a hundred years, which has limited the Regular Army of the United States to a small number. If we had this colonial army, if you might please to term it that for convenience, when the emergency had passed it could disappear, it could be withdrawn from service, or mustered out of service, without any dislocation of that connection which otherwise it would have with the Regular Army of the United States, and the Regular Army of the United States be maintained according to the domestic needs and requirements of the country.

We could have this foreign army, if you might so term it, or an army in foreign parts or in colonial parts, use it only when needed, and disband it when not needed. Another way in which it might be done is by a repetition of what we did two years ago, by an increase of this Army, either in its regular capacity or by addition to it of volunteers in such numbers as the emergency required to call forth for a limited time, for two years, and after that time our regular military establishment would assume its normal proportions. In one of these two ways, I think, it would be proper to have it done. Whilst I should prefer the former, I am ready to vote for the latter, but under no possible circumstances will I vote for any bill which increases the Regular Army of the United States to 100,000 men. I do not know whether I make myself clear to the distinguished Senator from Louisiana, but I have endeavored to do so.

Mr. CAFFERY. The point of my question is simply this (the Senator will pardon me if I put a wrong construction upon his language): As I understand, he limits the scope of his amendment to what may be termed the present emergency, and in further answer he says that the emergency might be met either by the simple organization of a foreign army for foreign purposes, or by such a provision as that inserted two years ago into the bill for the increase of the Army temporarily. What I desire to get at is, whether, in the opinion of the Senator, we could constitutionally and properly permit any abnormal increase of the Army now to meet any emergency at present existing.

Mr. MALLORY. Will the Senator from Louisiana permit me to ask him a question? The term used is "exigency," I believe.

Mr. CAFFERY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MALLORY. Has the Senator from Louisiana any understanding of what that present exigency is?

Mr. CAFFERY. My understanding of the exigency is the Presidential idea of carrying on war in the Philippines. Carrying on a war of subjugation in the islands of the archipelago. That is my idea of the exigency. The question I propounded to the Senator from Georgia was whether in his opinion that exigency demanded, if there is such a thing as an exigency in that particular, so abnormal an increase of the Army as is proposed in this bill.

Mr. MALLORY. It strikes me that the term "present exigency" is somewhat vague and inexplicit, and while it may be construed, as the Senator from Louisiana construes it, to apply solely to the disturbance now existing in the Philippine Islands, it might, it seems to me, also be construed to apply to other conditions which exist in other portions of our acquisitions or proposed acquisitions. We may possibly have an exigency—I do not know that it is imminent at all, but we may have one within a reasonable time—in the island of Cuba.

Mr. SPOONER. That is not an acquisition of ours.

Mr. CAFFERY. The exigency seems to comprehend and embrace all future possibilities of war. I was very much entertained the other day by a debate in which the junior Senator from Massachusetts took a conspicuous part, wherein he stated that one of the exigencies might be—probably was—the defense of the future canal to be constructed across the Isthmus of Darien. Now, what other exigency gentlemen of a warlike disposition may conjure up in the future I can not tell. I see no present exigency, using the term as it has been used by Senators in debate, except——

Mr. ALLEN. I should like, with the consent of the Senator, to put to him a question.

Mr. CAFFERY. Just let me finish the sentence—except the present war going on in the Philippine Islands between the United States military forces and what are termed the rebellious forces of the people of those islands. Now I will listen to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. ALLEN. I wanted to ask the Senator from Louisiana what he understands by the expression "the present exigencies of the service?" What is meant by that?

Mr. CAFFERY. I have attempted to explain what I understand by it. Now we had a peace establishment of, say, 30,000 men. This bill allows an increase of 70,000 men to form a permanent standing army. The ground mainly urged for this as a proper increase is the success of our arms in the Philippine Islands. These other exigencies I consider purely conjectural and would not form the basis or ought not to form the basis of any increase in the Army.

Mr. ALLEN. Then I should like to ask the Senator——

Mr. CAFFERY. I can understand the imperialistic policy——

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator another question, if he is disposed to answer it. Would not the insertion of the amendment of the distinguished Senator from Georgia—"during the present exigency"—be a legal recognition of some exigency that it is constitutional and proper to meet; and would not that be a recognition of the existing condition between the United States and the Filipinos?

Mr. CAFFERY. I do not want to pass any opinion.

Mr. ALLEN. I address myself now to the legal judgment of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. CAFFERY. I will candidly state to my friend that in my opinion the position assumed by the Senator from Georgia would legalize and bring within the constitutional scope the present war in the Philippine Islands. That is what I think. I can not see any other conclusion to be derived from the statement that he limits the proposed increase to the present exigency. Now, as there is no other exigency except this war, he therefore would recognize the validity of the war.

Mr. ALLEN. The effect, then, is to recognize the legality of the proceedings in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. CAFFERY. Not all of the proceedings.

Mr. ALLEN. The war proceedings?

Mr. CAFFERY. The war proceedings. Yes, sir; I think so. The Senator from Georgia has disclaimed in emphatic terms that he is in favor of any increase of the Army for a permanent organization, and limits his consent to an increase to what he calls the present exigency.

Mr. BACON. Oh, I do not consent to it at all.

Mr. CAFFERY. Well, it is an implied consent.

Mr. BACON. Not at all.

Mr. CAFFERY. Not an expressed one.

Mr. BACON. On the contrary, I distinctly repudiate it and deny it.

Mr. CAFFERY. The Senator from Georgia, of course, must pardon other Senators if they draw the construction from his language which is natural and which flows from his language, and, I think, is a natural consequence. His postulate is that he is opposed to a permanent increase of the Army. He modifies and qualifies that statement—he does not exactly favor, but he will permit, so far as he is concerned, an increase of the Army to meet the present exigency.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator permit one other question? I will not unnecessarily interrupt him. Does not the use of the expression "during the present exigency" recognize a condition in the Philippine Islands wherein it is perfectly lawful and proper for the United States to increase its Army, and by fighting overcome or conquer it?

Mr. CAFFERY. I think so.

Mr. FORAKER obtained the floor.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Louisiana——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Ohio will pardon me for a moment. The Senator from Louisiana asked a question, and proceeded to answer it himself and had the Senator from Nebraska answer it, and I would rather answer it for myself. It is a very remarkable proposition that the Senator from Louisiana should ask me a question and that then he and other Senators should proceed to discuss the question which was asked of me.

Mr. President, the Senator is entirely mistaken as to my attitude. I do not think any Senator here misconstrues my attitude, and I think that the Senators, upon reflection, will see that they are mistaken. I do not give my assent to this amendment as it will be amended. I am opposed to the amendment after the amendment which I propose has been adopted. My amendment, if adopted, is an amendment of limitation, not an amendment conferring power. There are three clauses, and each of them as they stand in the bill gives the President the unlimited power at any time in the future to increase the number of the Army about 50,000 men, in three branches of the service.

The amendment which I propose is one which limits it to the present time. It does not confer the power—I am not in favor of giving him the power—for the present time; but, as I know that the Senators on the other side of the Chamber have the power to pass the bill, I want to eradicate from it, as far as I can, the objectionable features, and the most objectionable feature in the bill, to my mind, is the feature which I am striking at, which would give the President, for all time, as long as the statute stood upon the books, the power to increase the Army.

This amendment limits it to this time; not that I am in favor of his having the power to do it, but I am doing the best that I can, and as I can not defeat the bill, I want to extract from it this poison, which I think is a most serious matter and the most serious feature of the bill—that which would confer upon the President for all time this objectionable power. This amendment limits him to this time, not because I am in favor of his exercising the power at this time, but because, as I can not defeat it, I want at least to cut off the future exercise of it.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I wish briefly to answer the suggestions of the Senator from Georgia. We have before us a bill which provides for the reorganization of the Regular Army. It is a bill which provides that we shall have at its minimum force an Army of 54,000 or 58,000, whichever computation is correct. I have not made any computation, but it has been stated by those who have at both numbers. But whichever may be the correct computation, that is the provision as to our Army; that is its normal size; that is its regular size, so to speak. It is to be kept at that size except only when the President, in the exercise of his discretion, may see fit, according to the provisions of this measure, to increase it. That is not a large Army under existing circumstances. We have heretofore in time of peace kept our Regular Army at about 30,000, speaking in round numbers.

Mr. BACON. Twenty-five thousand.

Mr. FORAKER. I think it was nearer 30,000.

Mr. SPOONER. Thirty thousand by law.

Mr. FORAKER. The legal maximum was 30,000, at which it might have been kept all the time. Its actual force was perhaps only 25,000, as the Senator from Georgia suggests. But with changed conditions, with our insular acquisitions, with the trouble we have been having in them, with what we have been proposing to do with respect to an interoceanic canal, and the necessity for increased forces on that account, it is not an unreasonable increase of the Army to make it 58,000 men, to be maintained at that figure at all times in peace. So far, then, as the minimum is concerned, the measure is entirely conservative.

But the bill has other features to which the Senator from Georgia objects. Those are the features now under consideration. His objection is that it gives to the President of the United States power, in his discretion, to increase the Army, and he told us this morning, in a very eloquent discussion, that this is unprecedented in the history of legislation upon this subject; that it is violative of the Constitution and a departure from anything ever heretofore known in the history of legislation with respect to our Army.

I wish to say to the Senator that it is not only not a departure, but it is in strict accord with a number of precedents on this subject. If he will take the trouble to examine the Statutes at Large, he will find that repeatedly the Congress of the United States has intrusted to the President of the United States a discretion with respect to the increase of the Army. I call his attention to a provision found in the First Statutes at Large, enacted in 1799, page 725. That act commences in this way:

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, in case war shall break out between the United States and a foreign European power, or in case imminent danger of invasion of their territory by any such power shall, in his opinion, be discovered to exist, to organize and cause to be raised, in addition to the other military force of the United States, 24 regiments of infantry—

And so on to the end as to each arm of the service, enumerating what the forces shall be by which the Army of the United States in a contingency shall be increased.

Then it is provided in section 5 of this act:

That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, at his discretion, to discharge the whole or any part of the troops which may be raised by virtue of this act, whensoever he shall think fit.

Now, it is true that that legislation was had in contemplation of apprehended war with France, and there was a threat, a menace of danger. The Congress of the United States, instead of raising an army and providing for its organization, simply provided that the Army might be raised, consisting of an organization it prescribed, whenever the President of the United States in his opinion should see fit to take such action, and then it provided that the Army so raised by the President under the power delegated to him should continue until the President saw fit to reduce it, and he should be the judge of the extent to which it should be reduced. He might reduce it in whole or in part. That is the provision of that statute.

Now, I have before me also volume 3 of the Statutes at Large, and at page 224 is found the act of March 3, 1815. I read the first section of that act, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the military peace establishment of the United States shall consist of such proportions of artillery, infantry, and riflemen, not exceeding in the whole 10,000 men, as the President of the United States shall judge proper, and that the Corps of Engineers, as at present established, be retained.

In other words, the discretion is left to the President to determine in what proportion the various arms of the service shall be to the total aggregate of the Army as prescribed and authorized by Congress.

I have before me also, Mr. President, the ninth volume of the Statutes at Large, and at page 11 of this volume I find the act of May 13, 1846, and this is the provision:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized by voluntary enlistment to increase the number of privates in each or any of the companies of the existing regiments of dragoons, artillery, and infantry to any number not exceeding 100 whenever, in his opinion, the exigencies of the public service may require the same, and to reduce the same to 64 when the exigencies requiring the present increase shall cease: Provided, That said enlistments shall be for the term of five years, and no longer, unless sooner disbanded by the President.

In other words, by this last act to which I have called attention there was absolute and unqualified discretion given to the President as to the increase of the Army within the maximum limit which Congress had seen fit to provide by law.

Now, what is it that Congress proposes to give to the President here? In the first place, we propose to create an army that shall have a minimum force of 58,000—if those are the correct figures. Then we are to have such an increased force, within a maximum named, as the President, in the exercise of the discretion conferred upon him, may see fit to employ. Now, what is that discretion? In the first place, by renumbered section 26 of the bill under consideration, the President is authorized as follows:

That the President is authorized to maintain the enlisted force of the several organizations of the Army at their maximum strength as fixed by this act during the present exigencies of the service, or until such time as Congress may hereafter direct.

In other words, having reference to existing conditions and the fact that we already have a difficulty to contend with, the President is authorized to maintain the Army at the maximum force fixed by this bill, if it become a statute, until that emergency shall pass away. In another provision the maximum is fixed at 100,000.

Now, if the Senator's amendment should carry, as I pointed out to him a while ago, these provisions, to which I understand him to say he has no objection, namely, keeping the Army at 100,000 until the emergency passes, would be rendered ineffective—I understand the Senator to say that he has no objection to 100,000 men until the existing emergency ceases. They would be negatived by the force of the amendment which he offers. And why? Let us turn back to the bill and see what is provided.

Mr. BACON. The Senator has evidently not kept up with the progress of the proceedings this morning.

Mr. FORAKER. I have observed that the Senator has been traveling about from place to place rather rapidly in this discussion, but I think I have kept pretty close track of him.

Mr. BACON. I think not, and I think when I have pointed it out, the facetious remark of the Senator will be found to be quite incorrect. The amendments to which he is now directing his attention with so much energy have been distinctly withdrawn by me and other amendments offered in their place.

Mr. FORAKER. What is the amendment that is now offered?

Mr. BACON. The amendments which I offered are amendments which I was told by the committee would be agreeable to them. They provide simply for the insertion in each of the clauses, after the word "President," beginning on the sixteenth page, of the words "during the present exigencies of the service."

Mr. FORAKER. Ah!

Mr. BACON. In other words, using the same language which is found in section 26.

Mr. FORAKER. I was not unmindful of the fact that such a suggestion had been made by the Senator, and that there had been on the part of some Senators an expressed intention or willingness to comply with it. I am opposed to that. I do not want any such words inserted in the bill, and I shall oppose the amendment whether it comes from the Senator from Georgia or the Senator from Vermont or the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, for it does not seem to me that it can be properly put in this bill without doing violence to the most attractive feature of this measure to me. Now, what is it?

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator kindly specify this matter to which he is objecting?

Mr. FORAKER. I am alluding to the matter referred to by the Senator from Georgia. The Senator from Georgia has offered certain amendments to the bill. They are amendments which do away with or affect the flexibility of the Army bill as to the different organizations. Now, when I am discussing that, before I have had time to urge the point that the Senator now precipitates, I am told by him that he has withdrawn those amendments, in view of the willingness of the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee to insert the word "exigencies" in these several provisions, and it is about that that I desire to speak. I was not unmindful of what had been suggested and what had been intimated would be accepted, but I have not yet reached that point.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will yield to nothing that will take away the flexibility of the Army.

Mr. FORAKER. I am glad of that.

Mr. HAWLEY. If the President should find, because of some great disaster by sea or on land, that his forces—say the artillery or some especially necessary branch of the service—had been reduced 4,000, I shall insist that he shall have the power to fill it up again.

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. And have the Army vibrate anywhere between the minimum and 100,000.

Mr. FORAKER. I was sure the Senator would have exactly that opinion about it.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not want anything else.

Mr. FORAKER. For fear there might be some question with others on that point, I took the floor as I have in order that I might say something in regard to it. I was only approaching it. I was speaking of the amendments of the Senator from Georgia as he offered them. I intended to come presently to the amendment of his amendments.

Mr. President, I have spoken of the flexibility of the Army during these existing emergencies as provided by section 26. I want to speak now of the other provisions for flexibility found in this bill. What are they? The President is authorized, under each of these provisions with respect to the different arms of the service, to increase that particular arm in his discretion to a maximum that is named. What is meant by that?

Just as the Senator from Connecticut, the chairman of the Military Committee, has now suggested, it means that if some emergency arises which induces the President to think that he ought to have more cavalry, for instance, than he has, or an emergency which calls for more artillery than the minimum named, or an emergency that calls for an increase of the Engineer Corps, the President shall have the authority to increase that particular branch of the service within certain limitations. In other words, he may increase the one for which he has the necessity instead of being compelled to increase them all alike.

So we have, with respect to this matter of flexibility, first, in the order in which I have called attention to them, a provision providing for the general increase of the whole Army during the existing emergency. I do not think anybody will pretend, in the light of what has been said here on this floor during this debate, that we should have a less Army than the maximum provided for by this bill until the existing exigency shall have passed away. I think we are all agreed about that, and that is a general provision applied to the whole Army, each and every branch of the service. He can increase it up to the maximum. Then, when that emergency shall have passed away and that flexibility will have passed away with it, there will remain—and this is what I want to call the attention of Senators to—a power in the President to increase the cavalry arm, or the infantry arm, or the artillery arm, or the Engineer Corps, if there should arise, in his opinion, a necessity for it.

Mr. President, is that a dangerous power to intrust to the President of the United States? The Senator from Georgia argues that it is. He argues that it is not only dangerous, but unprecedented. I have already pointed out that similar legislation to this has been heretofore enacted. I ought to have called attention in that connection to the fact that the law now in force—the act of 1898—provides for this same flexibility and intrusts it to the President of the United States, and certainly no harm has come from it. But consider what it is we are conferring upon the President. Is it dangerous as compared with his other powers with respect to the Army?

The President is the Commander in Chief. He can send the troops out of the country or keep them in the country. He can concentrate the Army or distribute it. He can send them to one section or the other, as in his judgment the exigencies may require. That is not accounted a dangerous power, and yet it might be made a dangerous power in the hands of an unscrupulous and designing President. But it is one of those powers which of necessity must be intrusted to some one, and, of course, necessarily to the Commander in Chief, who is the President of the United States.

Now, we have trusted all our Presidents with that kind of power, and necessarily, for a hundred years, and without injury or bad result in any respect. We can, in my judgment, safely continue to intrust that power to the President, and can continue to intrust it for all time to come, so long as our present institutions of Government continue, at least; and if such a power as that—other illustrations equally potent might be given—can be safely intrusted to him, surely we can safely intrust to him also the power to say whether or not in a contingency not now foreseen, but of which he shall be the judge, the cavalry shall be increased slightly, not the number of regiments, but simply the number of men in each regiment that shall belong to those regiments; whether they shall be increased from the minimum to the maximum or to any less degree that he may see fit to increase them.

Is it not safe, in other words, to intrust to our Commander in Chief, who has the entire disposition of our Army in sending it here, there, or elsewhere as he may see fit, the power also to increase it if in his judgment there is an emergency?

A mistake may be made as to the increase by some President we may have. I do not believe any serious mistake would have been made by any President we have ever yet had. I do not believe any serious mistake of that kind ever has been made. I do not believe the present President would make any serious mistake. I do not believe any President the people of the country are likely to choose will ever make any serious mistake in the matter of increasing any particular arm of the service under such provisions as we have in this bill.

This provision for flexibility is to me, as I said before in this debate, one of the best features of this bill. It is one of the best features because it enables us to keep the Army, when we have no real need of the Army, on a minimum basis, at the minimum figure, the least expensive and least burdensome figure at which it can be maintained. And it enables us the very moment danger is threatened to have it increased, increased throughout, by ordering each and every arm to be increased, or increased as to the artillery if we are threatened where that would be effective in resistance, or increased in any other arm of the service—in one arm or all the arms of the service.

Therefore it is that I hope the Senators in charge of this bill will not yield to the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia. I think we should enact it exactly as it is framed in that respect, and give to the President, because it is safe to do so, the power to increase the Army, as may be necessary, to the limit stated.

Mr. BACON. I call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to the fact that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], both of whom are members of the Committee on Military Affairs, expressed the opinion that the proposed statute as it now stands would not give the power to the President which the Senator from Ohio says is the chief excellence of the bill. It was only because of the fact that there is a difference between the Senators of the dominant party on that question that I ventured to draw this amendment in order to put at rest what they now differ upon themselves in construing the bill.

Mr. FORAKER. I think if the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Michigan made that statement—I did hear it made——

Mr. BACON. They certainly did make it.

Mr. FORAKER. If they made the statement, and the Senator from Georgia says they did, they must have made it without having first looked at the bill, or they must have made it when they had the other provision upon which I first commented in mind. There are two provisions. One authorizes the flexibility on account of the present exigencies. The minimum is to be gone back to the moment this exigency passes. The other provisions of flexibility have reference to the various arms, the cavalry, infantry, etc., and there is nothing said there about exigencies, but simply about the opinion of the President. He shall have power to increase the Army from the minimum to the maximum as to each branch of the service in his discretion. This is the language of the bill:

Provided, That the President, in his discretion, may increase the number of corporals in any troop of cavalry to 8, and the number of privates to 76, but the total number of enlisted men authorized for the whole Army shall not at any time be exceeded.

There is a similar provision as to the infantry, the artillery, and the Engineer Corps.

It seems to me that that does authorize the President of the United States, without regard to any exigency which now exists or any exigency which is in this bill described, to increase that particular branch of the Army whenever he, in his opinion, may think it ought to be increased. This provision is clear. I do not see how there can be any room for doubt, although it is doubtless to be assumed that the President will order an increase only when there is an occasion for it.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. May I call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to another feature which is not alluded to in his very excellent presentation of this subject? If it were possible to suppose that the President at any time should authorize enlistments above the minimum to an extent which Congress thought was improper, at the very next session of Congress the whole matter is in the hands of Congress not to appropriate for them. It seems to me that this distrust is as much a distrust of Congress as it is a distrust of the President.

Mr. FORAKER. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Connecticut for calling my attention to that point. I had intended to advert to it, but I spoke without any thought before I took the floor of what I would say, except in the most general manner, and that escaped me.

It is true, as the Senator from Connecticut says, that the distrust which is expressed here with respect to some President we may have in the future, or the present President, if you want to apply it to him, is at the same time a distrust, impliedly at least, as to the Congress of the United States, for what we are giving to the President a discretion about is a discretion to be exercised under this bill which Congress can correct, and would correct, as every Senator knows, the moment there would be any violation of the spirit or the language of the provision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON].

Mr. FORAKER. Let it be read as it now stands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 12, section 2, line 17, after the word "President," insert the words:

during the present exigencies of the service.

Mr. FORAKER. I wish to say to the Senator that I understood him only to say "in certain exigencies," but it appears that he here has adopted precisely the same language that is found in section 26.

Mr. BACON. Certainly, and the reason why I used that language is because it is the language used by the bill in another place conferring similar power.

Mr. President, I do not think that the contention of the learned Senator can possibly be maintained, that the present scheme of the bill is in harmony either with the institutions of our Government or with the practice of the Government. The Senator has read, in support of his contention, various statutes which have been enacted by Congress. The first one is the act of 1799, which, as he very correctly admitted, was an act passed in view of the urgent apprehension of war with France.

Mr. President, the conditions at that time must be taken into consideration in judging as to what was the view of Congress in the enactment of such a law. There were then no railroads and no telegraphs, and it took weeks even to communicate with the different parts of the country, as limited as it then was. It would necessarily take a long time for Congress to be assembled. Another thing is to be considered, and that is that the first intimation we had of war might be when the enemy appeared on our coast, because we had no submarine telegraph then to inform us of what occurred in Europe. Therefore it was recognized that there was a necessity that the President should be in a position to act promptly to meet an emergency when it would be impossible for him promptly to summon Congress to itself direct him what to do.

There is nothing, Mr. President, in the act of 1799 which in the remotest degree contemplates the conferring upon the President of the United States of a continuing power to increase and decrease the Army of the United States, according as he might judge there should be such increase or such decrease. There is not a line or a letter of it that can be construed in support of such a proposition. It simply authorizes him to proceed in case of an invasion, and, while the general terms were used, it simply meant if France should make war with America you are authorized to go ahead in the most energetic way within the limits expressed here to raise an army to meet it.

It was an absolute necessity that such should be the case for the safety of the country. One of the sections provides that if this emergency should arise and Congress should not be in session the President should proceed to commission the officers of it without waiting for the advice and consent of the Senate, showing the intention which was in the mind of Congress at the time.

In the same way, Mr. President, was the act of 1815. I ought to remark, before passing from that, that not only was the act of 1799 not intended as a continuing power. There was not a word in it which indicated that it was the purpose to make a permanent system under which the President of the United States would be authorized to increase or to decrease the Army at his will, but so soon as the emergency passed even that law was repealed.

Mr. President, it is not in contemplation here that the repeal of this law shall take place after the passing of any emergency. There is not a Senator on the floor who favors the bill who would say that he understands the purpose of the bill to be limited to the present exigency. On the contrary, they propose to provide an elasticity by which the President, not Congress, may in the future adapt the size of the Army to what he may consider to be the needs of the country. This is not designed as a temporary law; it is designed as a permanent law. The act of 1799 was designed as a temporary law to meet an emergency, and as soon as the emergency passed it was promptly repealed.

Now, Mr. President, as to the act of 1815, that gave no power to the President to increase or decrease an army. It simply gave the power to the President to raise an army of 10,000 men, that, and that only. There is no suggestion of any power to the President of the United States, as there was not in the other, that he should in his discretion increase or decrease the Army within a large range.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. Are the constitutional requirements different in time of war from what they are in time of peace? The Senator is admitting now, and that is what I call attention to, that certain acts have been passed by Congress to the constitutionality of which he makes no exception, and nobody else ever took exception to them in any other respect. But he says they applied only in time of war. The burden of his speech this morning, so far as I took exception to it, which was practical and immediate, was that this measure is unauthorized by the Constitution and contemplates——

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Ohio entirely misunderstands the presentation as I endeavored to make it. My contention is that in the statutes which he has read, there was a distinct power given to the President to raise a particular army for a particular purpose, and that there is in no one of these statutes the feature which I say is unconstitutional, which is the continuing feature, at his will and in his discretion, to raise or decrease the size of the Army.

Mr. FORAKER. I merely wanted to understand the Senator. I was apprehensive that I did not, and I see I did not. The Senator must admit that the statute cited—I think it is in the statute of 1846—does provide as explicitly as this bill for flexibility; that the President may increase the number, for instance, of privates in a cavalry company to a named number, and then he may decrease to a minimum number. Now, there was no war at that time.

Mr. BACON. There was one imminent.

Mr. FORAKER. There was one imminent, I know.

Mr. BACON. And it immediately followed.

Mr. FORAKER. But nobody knew certainly that it would come; and even if it did come, the President was to have that power in war. I want to know if this power of flexibility is confined to war; and if so, what there is in the Constitution that places such a limitation upon it?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, when the Congress of the United States passes a law with reference to a particular occasion and sets the limits, it is controlling so far as it is possible within the statute to control it; but when it absolutely abdicates its powers and puts a permanent statute upon the books to the effect that the President of the United States shall have the power in peace and in war and for all time, because there is no limitation——

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will permit me, does he observe the force of the language, "or until Congress shall otherwise direct?" Does the Senator make the proposition that Congress is shackling itself a particle by this bill, if it shall become a law, as to any power which by the Constitution is conferred upon Congress for the raising of an army?

Mr. BACON. I say undoubtedly Congress is abdicating its power.

Mr. SPOONER. In what respect?

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will permit me, I will endeavor to come to that point a little later. If I do not, I hope the Senator will remind me before I take my seat, because I want to say something on that subject.

Mr. SPOONER. I certainly will.

Mr. BACON. I say, Mr. President, replying first to the Senator from Ohio, that there is a vast difference between a case where Congress passes a law in view of an imminent war which says that the President of the United States may raise a certain number of troops, and if the emergency passes he must discharge them, and a case where it is proposed to put upon the statute books a permanent law.

Mr. FORAKER. Is that a constitutional provision?

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, I got this far before and the Senator from Wisconsin stopped me. I want to complete it, please.

Mr. FORAKER. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BACON. I say there is a vast difference between that and a permanent law by which the Congress of the United States says that hereafter whenever, in the judgment of the President of the United States, it is important or deemed wise by him to add 50,000 men to the Army he can do it, either in peace or in war, and without reference to any emergency which is now in the contemplation of Congress. I say there is a difference, and a wide difference.

Now, Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] as to whether or not it is abdication by Congress of its power to pass such a law as this, the Senator asks whether the reservation in this law "until Congress shall otherwise provide"—that I understand to be the meaning of his question—is not such a reservation as would exclude the idea that it was intended as a permanent grant of power. Am I correct?

Mr. SPOONER. I think the Senator is partly correct, and partly the Senator misunderstands me.

Mr. BACON. Very well; that is the reason why I asked the question. I want to be sure.

Mr. SPOONER. I asked the Senator how he could call that a permanent law which provided that it shall continue in force only until Congress shall otherwise direct. In other words, is there any law which we pass which continues in force any longer than Congress otherwise directs? If it be a law it continues within the power of Congress. I do not know of any law which can be passed by Congress in regard to the Army that is not always subject to the control of Congress. Does the Senator know of any such law?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the Senator evidently intended exactly what I said before, that the expression——

Mr. SPOONER. It requires no reservation by Congress in order to enable Congress to act upon this subject whenever it chooses.

Mr. BACON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SPOONER. The only point of the provision is, as I understand it, that it gives the President some elasticity or power as to his judgment of exigencies, which I think it ought to do, until Congress shall act; that is all.

Mr. BACON. No; until Congress shall otherwise direct. Is not that the language?

Mr. SPOONER. It is the same thing as "until Congress shall otherwise direct," because his power would not be interrupted at all if Congress reenacted the same provision. That is what I understand that to mean.

Mr. BACON. Very well. Now, I am coming to the point that the Senator's inquiry makes necessary. I trust I may have the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin. I say those words are words that are entirely surplusage; that every act of Congress might be expressed, "This is the law until Congress provides otherwise," and it is that way without the words or with the words, and the words may as well not be there. They do not mean anything, because every statute means that without the words. Every statute is the law until Congress provides otherwise, and it is not necessary to express in the statute that it shall be the law until Congress provides otherwise.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator misunderstands me in part. I did not mean to say, nor do I think I did say, that those words were efficacious at all so far as they related to the power of Congress; but I think with the disjunctive they are effective so far as the power of the President is concerned, as I think they ought to be. I do not know what construction would be put upon the words "present exigency." Possibly some one might contend, and I presume many Senators would contend, that it is limited to a surrender in the Philippines. That might not be at all adequate to the interest of the country or the protection of the Army.

If there were peace in the Philippines to-day it might be that pending the establishment of a government of the people there it would not be safe to withdraw the forces, perhaps, down to 10,000 men. We have had a notification read within a week, signed by 2,000 men in the Philippines, that if peace shall come there it will be a temporary peace, and that under cover of it preparations will be made for another insurrection.

Although strictly construing the words "the present exigency," that is, the exigency dated from to-day, there might still be, in the opinion of the President, necessity for maintaining a force there for police purposes and for the protection of the people and all that.

I construe the phrase "or until Congress shall otherwise direct" to authorize the President, if in his judgment the public interest requires it, to maintain that force in the Philippines until Congress shall otherwise direct. That is the only effect I can see to that phrase in section 26. Of course, it has no effect whatever upon the power of Congress. I never intimated that it did.

Mr. BACON. Now, Mr. President, to return to the question as to whether this is an abdication of the powers of Congress—because I think that is the vital question here—whenever a statute is put upon the books it means that it is the law until Congress otherwise directs, whether it is so expressed or not. Whenever a statute is put upon the books it is put there with the idea that it shall always be the law unless Congress shall change its mind.

In other words, so long as conditions remain as they are at the time of the enactment of the law, the presumption is that it is a wise law. That is a very violent presumption sometimes I think, especially in the present instance, but it is the presumption in the case of every enactment that it is the proper thing to be done, and Congress does it because Congress believes it to be the proper thing to be done. Therefore, in the enactment of the law Congress contemplates a law which will be permanent.

Now, Mr. President, that is the contemplation of this proposed law. The contemplation of this proposed law is that it shall be a permanent law, and there is not a Senator on the other side of the Chamber who will rise in his place and say that he contemplates this as a temporary law.

Mr. HAWLEY. I say so. The Senator knows this enactment can not last; that the lifting of the finger of Congress will sponge it out.

Mr. BACON. Oh, undoubtedly.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator knows that perfectly well. There is no permanent law. There is not even a permanent Constitution, for the Constitution contains the elements of its own destruction.

Mr. BACON. Unfortunately, under the influence of certain political powers, there is a very great danger that there is to be no permanent Constitution. It is the great trouble and the great evil and the great menace and the great danger to the people of this country that certain parties have made up their minds that it shall not be permanent.

Mr. HAWLEY. Name them.

Mr. BACON. Well, the Senator hardly means that.

Mr. HAWLEY. Name one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators must address the Chair——

Mr. BACON. I decline, if that will satisfy the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. And must not interrupt the Senator who has the floor without his consent.

Mr. BACON. The danger is not that they will meet on the steps of the Capitol and declare that the Constitution is abrogated, because the people would not sustain them and it would not be permitted, but the danger is that little by little the foundations are to be removed until after a while it will topple and fall.

It has gotten so now, Mr. President, that when one in this Chamber endeavors to maintain a proposition by measuring it to the requirements of the Constitution, what he says is disregarded and often laughed at by some people in private if not in public.

But I come back to the proposition, because I have been led away from it several times, as to whether this is an abdication of the powers of Congress. I repeat what I said this morning, that while it is bad enough for history to repeat itself by the aggressions by which, without the consent of the legislative body, its powers are taken away from it, it is a thousand times worse when that body itself abdicates those powers.

Now, is this an abdication? This is intended as a permanent law—Senators have avowed it here—so that it may adjust itself to the needs of the future. It is intended that permanent power shall be in the hands of the President to increase or to decrease the Army of the United States. If that is a power which, under the Constitution, properly belongs to the legislative body, and we delegate it to the President and say we will not hereafter pass laws which shall say when the Army shall be increased or decreased, but the President of the United States shall be clothed with the power, then, I repeat, we have abdicated our proper powers, and our powers in one of the most important features incident to and belonging to a free government.

Mr. President, I know it is perfectly common now for Senators and others to put aside the suggestion that there may be any danger to our institutions in anything, that there may be any danger in the surrender of any of the restrictions which our fathers thought it necessary to throw around those who were invested with power, but it is with governments and institutions as it is with people. No man thinks he is going to die. Each man thinks that the time for his death is going to be postponed in his case to the utmost limit. And yet we hear of men dying around us every day. The history of the world is in the decay of institutions and in the death of governments. I repeat, it is not done in a day, but everything which weakens the foundations of the structure hastens the time when it will come.

For one, Mr. President, I appreciate the dignity and the powers of the legislative department of this Government. It was the design of the framers of the Constitution that these great powers of government should be exercised by the legislative body, and in the enumeration of powers almost every power of government is conferred upon the Congress of the United States, meaning thereby the lawmaking power. For one, I do not intend by any act of mine to surrender any jot or tittle of that power, whether the Executive who is to receive the benefit of it be a man who belongs to my party or one who is opposed to it.

I will say, Mr. President, that one of the first speeches I ever made in this body was in the assertion of the powers of the legislative department as against the encroachments of the Executive at a time when the Executive chair was filled by a man who had been elected by Democrats. I care not, Mr. President, if the Executive chair were filled by the man who stood nearest to me personally as well as politically, I would never, under any possible influences or for any possible purpose, surrender the least particle of power which I think properly belongs to the legislative department of the Government.

Now, Mr. President, if Senators will pardon me for going a little further into this matter than I had intended, it was suggested in the debate last week, and has been repeated here to-day, that Congress still retains in its hands the power to control this question, owing to the fact that it retains the power to appropriate money or to reduce the appropriation of money. That, of course, is an answer to a certain extent, but it is not a complete answer where there is no limit put upon the discretion of the President.

There is nothing done by which the Congress can say to him, "You abuse that discretion." If the President of the United States, supposing the Army had been decreased to the minimum, should, upon the adjournment of Congress on the 4th of March, increase the Army 50,000 men and keep it at that maximum figure for nine months, until the next Congress should convene, and should send in his message here saying that he had done it, is there any Senator here, I care not whether he belongs to the party of the Executive or is opposed to the party of the Executive, who would refuse to appropriate money for the purpose of paying the expenses of the Army for the nine months when increased 50,000 men?

It is true, Mr. President, that ordinarily the expenses of the Army are estimated for and are provided for in a bill which we pass here in advance. The Senators will easily remark that in the case contemplated by this bill it is an impossibility for Congress to estimate what will be the military expenses. It is an impossibility for Congress in an appropriation bill, under the terms of this bill, with any accuracy to determine what amount of money should be appropriated for the succeeding fiscal year. It is in the contemplation of law that in these nine months there is going to be or may be unexpected increases. Here is an unexpected increase.

Right here this brings up an objection to this bill which had not occurred to me before, but which is a most serious one; and that is, that under the terms of this bill and under the practical operation of it, as I have just suggested, not only would the President of the United States have the power to determine upon an increase of the Army to the extent of 50,000 men, without any suggestion or warrant of authority from Congress, but it puts it in the power of the Executive to practically appropriate that much money, increasing the expenditures of the Government without any act of Congress, because we put in his hands a power, in the exercise of which in his own discretion he would incur an expenditure that no legislator, I care not what may be his attitude toward the Executive, could possibly deny the appropriation of money to defray.

So, Mr. President, it is not simply a question of increasing the Army; it is not simply a question of the legislative branch of this Government abdicating its power to determine what shall be the size of the Army; it is not simply a question of putting it into the power of the President of the United States to increase the Army 50,000 men whenever he sees proper to do so, but it is a question of putting it into the power of the Executive to increase the expenditures from thirty to fifty million dollars in the course of one year, and compelling Congress to appropriate without any suggestion from Congress in the way of the initiation of that expenditure.

Mr. CAFFERY. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. CAFFERY. I wish to ask the Senator whether the incorporation in the bill of the provision to which I have referred would be sufficient to render it constitutional from his standpoint? Would it meet his view to provide that the increase of the Army in this bill authorized—it may be an Army of 98,000 or 100,000 men—to the maximum provided shall be and is for the purpose of carrying on the war in the Philippine Islands to a successful conclusion? I ask the Senator whether he thinks the mention of the purpose of the increase of the Army would relieve the bill of its unconstitutional features?

Mr. BACON. I do not think the question of constitutionality, which I am now discussing, if the Senator from Louisiana will pardon me, is the question of the exercise by the Executive power of the right to increase or decrease the Army and to determine what shall be the size of the Army. I do not desire to evade the Senator's question in any way, and I will answer briefly what he says, although I desire to continue somewhat further on the line I was pursuing.

The Senator asks as to the constitutionality, as I understand it, of the Army being used in the Philippine Islands. Am I correct in that?

Mr. CAFFERY. I asked the Senator whether, if the purpose of allowing the President to increase the Army to the maximum was clearly set out in the bill—the present purpose I take it would be, and it is not denied, for the subjugation of the Philippine insurgents—I asked the Senator whether, if the purpose for which the Army is to be increased be put in the bill, it would be relieved of its unconstitutional features.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the objectionable feature of the bill is the fact that it does not limit the power to any occasion; but if the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] is correct, it for all time in the future, so long as this law shall remain upon the statute books, puts it in the power of the President to increase the Army. That is what I say is the unconstitutional feature of it; that is what I say is the abdication of power by the Congress of the United States.

Possibly the interruption of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY] was fortunate, as I might have pursued this line of thought longer than was consistent with my duty to the Senate that I should not unduly occupy its time, and therefore I break off on that question; but I want to say this——

Mr. CAFFERY. I am sorry I have diverted the Senator.

Mr. BACON. Oh, no, that is all right; and I was congratulating myself on that fact.

What I want to say, however, is this: In endeavoring to strike at the root of the matter I offered three amendments which took away the power of the President to increase each of these three branches of the service. Under the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] I withdrew those amendments, because I understood that it would be agreeable to those who are in charge of the bill that the same language should be used as to these three several branches as is used in section 26, limiting the exercise of the power to the exigencies of the service. If the Senate is content with that, while, of course, I do not favor the section, even with that amendment, it is a limitation which would remove from it the most serious objection to it, and I will not press the other amendments.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator is aware that it is unnecessary, so far as these three provisions are concerned, that he should repeat that language, because the end is already accomplished by the provision of section 26, that the President is expressly authorized to maintain the Army at its maximum as hereinbefore provided "during the present exigencies of the service." Now, if you amend the section as proposed by the Senator from Georgia, you take away the maximum provision, and there will be no maximum, unless it be a maximum of 54,000.

Mr. BACON. Not by the insertion of the word "maximum."

Mr. FORAKER. No; if you will change it so as to insert that word, it would not; but as the Senator offered to amend the provision, it would take that away. If the Senator proposes to leave the maximum, it is unnecessary to amend this provision, because it is already covered by the provision of section 26. The reason I favor this is because I want this power to remain after the exigency has passed.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator understand when the exigency has passed that the President will not again have the right to increase the Army?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly. I understand the bill in this way: Under section 26 the President will be authorized to maintain the Army at the maximum, according to the organization provided for, until these exigencies shall have passed. Then when the exigencies have passed the President will reduce the Army, if there be no other exigencies, to the minimum. The power is left to him under the provisions of the bill to increase to the maximum again any branch of the service if, in his opinion, it be proper to do so.

Mr. BACON. It is for the exact purpose of correcting that latter provision that I offered the amendments.

Mr. FORAKER. It is such a wise provision that I favor it.

Mr. PROCTOR. If the Senator will allow me, I myself have no objection to these amendments, and, on a hasty word with the chairman of the committee, he did not see any objection to them. My opinion is that that is a fair construction of the bill; and I was for the moment led to assent to the amendments, hoping that that might end this discussion. However, it seems the more the Senator talks the more dangerous things he sees here. I can see plainly that any assent would not have the effect I hoped it might have. The Senator now sees the bugbear that it would give the President the power of appropriating money; and what will come next I can not say.

Mr. BACON. Only a word in that connection.

Mr. PROCTOR. I myself think I shall have to retract any seeming assent, and say that the only safe ground is to oppose this amendment and the various other amendments which the Senator has foreshadowed.

Mr. BACON. Before the Senator takes his seat, I should like to ask him a question. The Senator speaks of my suggestion that the provision would give to the President practically the power to appropriate money. I wish to ask the Senator if, during the recess of Congress, without any other authority than that which is expressed in this bill, and without there ever having been any appropriation of money to meet the expenses, the President should increase the size of the Army 50,000 men, when the Congress reassembled could the Senator imagine any possible circumstances under which he would refuse to vote for the appropriation of the money made necessary by that act of the President?

Mr. PROCTOR. When there is any amendment or any provision that touches that question I shall be ready to discuss it.

Mr. BACON. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. PROCTOR. But there is not any such question now pending, and I think there is no occasion to answer the Senator's suggestion.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt him a moment, I wish an explanation of the phrase "during the present exigencies." What does the Senator from Vermont understand by the phrase "present exigencies?"

Mr. PROCTOR. I understand it refers principally to the situation in the Philippines and the necessity for our maintaining a large army there. I think the fair construction is not that when peace is sustained for a day or a week or a month the President is obliged to withdraw or reduce the Army under this bill, but when he is satisfied that there is a permanent cessation of trouble.

Mr. ALLEN. I wish to ask the Senator another question. I understand that legally a state of peace has existed between the United States and China for a great many years, but de facto we are in a state of war. Now, does the condition in China come under this expression "during the present exigencies of the service?"

Mr. PROCTOR. Well, Mr. President, that is a question which I think it is hardly necessary to discuss; besides it appears that the exigencies of the Government in China are about terminated; but perhaps just now the exigency exists in a small measure.

Mr. ALLEN. Perhaps the Senator will answer another question. Who is to determine when the exigency shall have passed away?

Mr. PROCTOR. The President of the United States, as I understand.

Mr. ALLEN. The Government of the United States is divided into three departments—legislative, executive, and judicial. That constitutes the United States Government. What particular branch of the Government is to determine when the exigencies are removed?

Mr. PROCTOR. I did not catch the Senator's question.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask what particular branch or branches of the Government of the United States are to determine when the exigencies referred to by the Senator from Georgia shall have been removed?

Mr. PROCTOR. The President of the United States "until," as the provision in the bill is worded, "such time as Congress may hereafter direct."

Mr. ALLEN. Are the people, the courts, the Congress, or the President to decide?

Mr. PROCTOR. I thought I answered the Senator's question that the President of the United States is to decide.

Mr. ALLEN. I did not hear that. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. PROCTOR. The President of the United States is to decide, unless Congress directs otherwise. It is all the time under the direction of Congress.

Mr. ALLEN. Do I understand it to be true that the Army will continue at its maximum strength, at about 108,000, indefinitely, until some President of the United States proclaims officially that the exigencies have been removed? That is correct, is it not?

Mr. PROCTOR. The Senator will notice that the bill expressly limits the possible number of the Army to 100,000.

Mr. ALLEN. That may be so, but my understanding is that the bill permits the Army to be increased to about 108,000.

Mr. PROCTOR. That is impossible under the bill.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well, make it a hundred thousand. Then I put this question: Under the bill making the Army 100,000——

Mr. PROCTOR. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] made that suggestion, but he now says that he was mistaken, and that the maximum number is 100,000.

Mr. TELLER. I had figured on the first clause, but I think the last clause is undoubtedly the controlling clause.

Mr. ALLEN. That is a mere bagatelle. The real question is, that it is really within the discretion of the President to determine when the exigencies are removed. Then, suppose that this thing continues for, say, five, ten, fifteen, or twenty-five years, and there is no proclamation or no official action on the part of the President of the United States saying that the exigencies have been removed, will the increased Army continue that long?

Mr. PROCTOR. Unless Congress shall otherwise direct.

Mr. ALLEN. Unless Congress shall repeal this law?

Mr. PROCTOR. Or fail to appropriate for the Army.

Mr. ALLEN. Or fail to appropriate for the Army. Of course Congress can not appropriate to sustain the Army for more than two years at any one time. Then Congress will be forced, if it disagrees with the Executive, to fail to appropriate the necessary money to maintain this Army and by that means drive it out of existence. Is that correct?

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Nebraska an answer to that question. This Army of ours under existing law, and under the law as it will stand if this bill shall pass, consists of soldiers enlisted for a term of three years. Therefore, this Army will be constantly changing in its personnel.

The whole question must, in the nature of things, be within the discretion and the power of Congress. We have over and over again, in our statutes making appropriations for the Army, provided that the appropriation for the enlistment of recruits and their transportation should not be used for an Army beyond a certain number, and, though this bill provides for a maximum of 100,000, Congress can in any appropriation bill, at any time, as we have done year after year, say that the appropriation for recruiting and the transportation of recruits shall not be used for an Army exceeding 80,000 men or 75,000 men. To my mind no minimum should be fixed. Such a provision would lead to confusion. That minimum was probably put in because we wanted to increase the number of regiments and wanted to have a skeleton army of a larger number than 54,000 men, which, when an appropriation was made, could be used as a basis for 100,000.

So, Mr. President, when we adjourn on the 4th of March and come here in December the whole control as to the maximum number of men who shall be used in the Army will be within the competence of the Congress to say whether it shall continue at 100,000 or 85,000 or at any other number. Therefore the statement that we are fixing an Army here of 100,000 men which will not be within the control and supervision of Congress is, to my mind, an immaterial suggestion. Of course, this Army will consist of 100,000 men if next year we shall appropriate for 100,000 men, and also appropriate money to enable the President of the United States to recruit one-third of this Army during that year. It can not be done otherwise, because when the terms of enlistment expire the Army is pro tanto reduced, and it can not be increased without an appropriation providing for recruits from year to year.

I am not troubled at all about these provisions of the bill, which are simply provisions which place in the power of the President a flexibility which, in the nature of things, he must use within the appropriations of money given from year to year by the Congress; and if he had a purpose to use it improperly, contrary to law and the judgment of Congress, the very next session of Congress would check that judgment and limit the appropriation. So there is no abdication of the power of Congress here, and there is no limitation upon the power of Congress, except that limitation which we have fixed in our statutes hitherto, but never before, so far as I know, bringing the Army down to a minimum. This bill, however, for the purpose of providing for this flexibility, fixes a minimum number and a maximum number; but that is of no moment. We can make the minimum less than 50,000 hereafter if we so decide in Congress. It is a perfectly legitimate thing upon the Army appropriation bill to limit the appropriation for recruits for the Army.

Mr. President, this bill, if it is passed as it now stands, gives no greater additional power to the President of the United States than he now has, or any power which he is likely to exercise unduly, or that any President, whether this year or four years or ten years from now, will be likely to so exercise.

Now, I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska whether he does not think it will be within the competence of Congress next session, or two years from now, if we think that 100,000 men are not necessary, to say that the Army shall not be recruited beyond 85,000 or 75,000, as the exigencies of that period may require? So there is no danger, and there can be no danger, in the provisions of this bill, as I understand them, respecting the size of the Army from year to year.

Mr. ALLEN. I should dislike very much to put the Senator and his party in Congress at cross purposes with the Chief Executive. I want to see the utmost harmony prevail in Republican circles between Congress and the Executive.

Mr. ALLISON. I am very glad to know that.

Mr. ALLEN. Wait a moment. I can well understand how Senators of the long service and distinguished ability of my friend from Iowa can rest content under a bill expressed in this language; but for one of limited experience, perhaps I might say, parenthetically, somewhat of a stranger, I can see difficulties ahead.

Here is a provision that I doubt is to be found in any bill or in any act of Congress in the whole history of this Government. It is abnormal; it is unusual; it is the work of a mere moment, without reflection; and that is, that the President of the United States, without any restraint whatever from any source, can increase the Regular Army from a minimum of 50,000, or practically so, to 100,000, and retain it at that figure so long as certain exigencies, which are not mentioned, shall exist. What are those exigencies? The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] may say that the condition of the Philippine Islands is one of the exigencies; the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] may say the condition in China is an exigency; my distinguished friend the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE] may say some other condition is an exigency. Who is to determine these things? Who is to determine what the exigency is? Why not mention it? Why not say it is the condition existing in the Philippine Islands or in China that constitutes these exigencies?

Now, who is to determine when these exigencies are removed? We are told the President of the United States, of course, being the Chief Executive of the nation and the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, both in time of war and in time of peace. In him, and in him alone, is vested this singular power of determining when these exigencies are removed, and in him, and in him alone, rests the power of determining what these exigencies are.

Then the Senator says that these things can be met in one of two ways. That is quite true. In the first place, the Constitution limits the power of appropriation to two years, which you could never, if you follow the Constitution—I do not know whether you follow it or not, but I sometimes doubt whether it has been followed in many of its provisions—but if the Constitution is to be followed, you can limit the appropriation to two years. You can not exceed that, and by this means you can starve out this army. Does the Senator from Iowa contemplate a time when, in his opinion, the relations between the Chief Executive of this nation and Congress will be so strained that Congress will starve out an Army that the Executive of this nation thinks is necessary to meet an exigency?

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator wholly misunderstands me. We never have appropriated for an army for a period exceeding one year, and then we have appropriated for just such an army as Congress thought was necessary to provide for an exigency. Of course the President under this act can exercise this flexible power, but he can exercise it only when he has the support from year to year of the Congress of the United States as to the number of men that we think are necessary for the conduct of the Army from year to year and from time to time. Therefore that power, although lodged in the President by this bill, is always subordinated to the action of Congress when it shall come to provide for the appropriations necessary to maintain the Army. There is not the slightest difficulty about it.

Mr. ALLEN. I am not saying what Congress has done. It has done many things which it ought not to have done, and perhaps left undone many things which it ought to have done. I am talking about what it can do. It can make an appropriation not exceeding two years for the maintenance of the Army. That is the constitutional provision. Suppose we see fit to do so. Having done that, and the President of the United States says these exigencies still continue, does the Senator from Iowa say that Congress will not make an appropriation upon a suggestion of that kind for another two years, and go on unconstitutionally for an indefinite period of time?

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, suppose that Congress believes that next year, or two years from this time, an army of 75,000 men is enough——

Mr. ALLEN. And the President says it is not enough.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. If Congress disagrees with him, it makes an appropriation for a less number, and, if it agrees with him, it will appropriate for the number of men that he thinks is necessary, and not otherwise.

We have not appropriated here from year to year in any appropriation bill, so far as I know, in exact accordance with the recommendations of the heads of Departments or the President. We exercise the power here in this body after it is exercised by the House of Representatives, they holding in their hands first the purse strings of this nation, and no appropriation can be made, according to the decisions and long usage of Congress, until it is first provided for in the House of Representatives. The two Houses must act upon the Army appropriation bill as they act upon the river and harbor bill and upon other appropriations that come to us from year to year, and they fix the amount of the appropriation, which necessarily limits the expenditure.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? Can not the same Congress revoke the appropriation at any time?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. It has just as much control over the application as the giving?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly. There is no doubt about it. If it has not been expended, they can revoke it. But the Senator now apprehends a danger in the distant future that some Congress will come here and will make an appropriation for two years, and that therefore after that Congress adjourns the President can exercise this power for a year or more. That is the implication of his argument.

I venture the statement that no Congress will ever propose an appropriation for the Army or the Navy or for any other purpose, giving a discretion to the Departments for a longer period than one year, unless it be a case where the expenditure can not be made within a year. So there is no danger from the suggestion made by the Senator from Nebraska that we will appropriate money, extending beyond a year, at any time, for the Army or the Navy. These matters are constantly within the supervision and control of Congress, and no President will or can exercise a power contrary thereto.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from Iowa has taken up a mere incident of what I have said as the principal item.

Mr. ALLISON. If so, I beg pardon.

Mr. ALLEN. But now suppose, when you come next year to the appropriation for the Army, the President says "the exigencies of this war still exist;" does the Senator contemplate that it is probable that the word of the President of the United States would not be taken by Congress, and the appropriation made?

Mr. ALLISON. I will ask the Senator, he having a part of the responsibility, whether he would not exercise his judgment, having all the facts and the surroundings and the situation before him, and, if necessary, say to the President in the appropriation: "We think you have made the maximum limit too high. We think you can get along with 95,000 men instead of 100,000." Would we not exercise that discretion and that power here? We always have done it.

Mr. ALLEN. Then the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] is wrong.

Mr. ALLISON. I am sorry if he is wrong, for he is scarcely ever wrong.

Mr. ALLEN. He is.

Mr. ALLISON. I did not understand him to take any other view of the subject.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from Vermont said that the sole power to determine whether the exigencies were removed was with the President of the United States.

Mr. BURROWS. In the first instance.

Mr. ALLISON. That is true for a limited period. If we provide here for a hundred thousand men and follow it with an appropriation for a hundred thousand men, then the President has that discretion, and he will exercise it, of course. But suppose we come here next year and the Military Affairs Committee, instead of appropriating for a hundred thousand men, appropriate for 90,000 men; then can the President increase it beyond 90,000 men?

Mr. ALLEN. What I was coming to was——

Mr. PROCTOR. Will the Senator allow me? The Senator from Vermont qualified that statement by adding "until Congress shall otherwise direct."

Mr. ALLEN. I did not hear that part of it. I stand corrected, of course. But what I particularly desire to refer to is that it is not reasonably probable that the time will ever come, at least for a great many years, if the Republican party remains in power a great many years, and I have no doubt it will, when Congress will fail to follow out the recommendation of the President with an appropriation for the Army; and if the President of the United States intimates to his party associates, who are dominant in both branches of Congress, that the exigencies mentioned in this bill still continue, so long as he does that, his party will give him an appropriation to keep the Army at its maximum. So, after all, practically speaking, the time will never come in the history of this kind of legislation, until the President himself says the exigencies are entirely removed, when the Army will be reduced to its minimum. If he fails to do it, the Army will stand at a hundred thousand twenty-five years from to-day as well as now. So, as a matter of fact, we have a permanent standing army of a hundred thousand men saddled upon us in time of peace.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] with his usual skill has suggested a method whereby the Congress can declare that the exigency does not exist for an increase of the Army. It goes without saying that whenever Congress votes to place so much confidence in a President of the United States, the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, as to give him the power to increase an army, it is to meet an exigency. If Congress thinks that the Regular Army ought, to be a hundred thousand men or a hundred and fifty thousand men, it has no need to say that that should only be so in case of an exigency. Congress is as capable of deciding what an exigency is as is the President of the United States, and perhaps more so, or equally as much so.

Mr. ALLISON. Is the Senator now arguing that all these provisions about exigencies should be struck from the bill?

Mr. CAFFERY. I have not reached that point of the argument at all.

Mr. ALLISON. That is the implication.

Mr. CAFFERY. When Congress increases an army from a peace establishment of 30,000 men, or allows the President to do so, to an establishment of a hundred thousand men, even without stating any emergency, it would be presumed that one existed to justify such an increase.

Mr. President, the method suggested by the Senator from Iowa is conspicuously a legal method to signify a dissent upon the part of Congress to the action of the President if he has swelled the Army to the maximum. The expedient is to fail to appropriate for the maximum. It is perfectly competent and within the power of Congress to do so. But the pertinent inquiry of the Senator from Nebraska comes in, "Why not let Congress declare what the exigency is that authorizes this increase up to a hundred thousand men from 30,000?" We all know what the exigency is. The people of the United States know what that exigency is. There is no use to confuse the matter by vague conjectures as to a possibility of conflict with England on the Isthmus, or as to any possible complication with China, or with the powers of the world that are seeking to divide and partition that ancient Kingdom or Empire. It is hardly within the remotest possibility that we will ever have a conflict with England in regard to our action respecting the Nicaraguan Canal.

But we have a present, glaring exigency. It is the war in the Philippines. That exigency may be covered, and I doubt not constitutionally, without mentioning it, as was the case in the Mexican war, when the Army was authorized to be raised to meet an exigency. That exigency was known to all men at that period, and war was imminent. But we not only have a war that can be immediately forced upon us, but we have a war. Why not make the issue direct and plain, and say in this bill that, pending the disturbances in the Philippine Islands, the President of the United States is hereby authorized to increase the Army to a hundred thousand men and to maintain it at that maximum until the Filipinos are permanently subjugated. That is the point of the whole controversy. It may be met by giving to the President the power to raise this Army up to the maximum, but I take it that this increase is for that purpose, and not agreeing with the majority here or the President that the war should be waged for that purpose, I can not give my consent to this bill.

I see no constitutional objection, in my own mind, to giving the President the power to increase an army up to a certain point. Congress always has it within its power, even without any such expression as is contained in the bill—"until otherwise ordered by Congress"—through the method pointed out by the Senator from Iowa, to reduce the Army by failing to appropriate but for just so many men. That is evident. But when we are voting for an army of this kind, when it is proposed that an army of this sort should be raised, it occurs to me that candor requires that we ought to express upon the face of the bill the purpose for which the army is required.

My friend the Senator from Iowa, and other gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber who advocate the continuance of the war in the Philippines until the Filipinos are finally subjugated, know just as well as I do that this increase is not of a permanent character, and it is not designed for all future time to give the President of the United States the power to raise the Army up to the maximum of a hundred thousand men, or any other number to which he may choose to raise it.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I think there is nobody in the United States who has the least fear whatever of the abuse of a President's power. I do not think we have ever since the days of George Washington, as a people, felt such fear, because the expenditure of the money and the conduct of the war are just as much under the control of the people as the winding of their watches. You need not talk about giving the President discretion, because the Constitution of the United States makes him Commander in Chief of the Army. He has the discretion already, in advance, conferred upon him.

But what troubles me is not a theory, not a wild misapprehension or pretension of misapprehension; I do not think anybody worries about that; the discussion is academic, as the phrase is. What troubles me is that we have to release about 30,000 of our soldiers and bring them a month's journey across the Pacific and send somebody in their places. The emergency is one that is coming very closely and very painfully upon us. Thirty-five thousand volunteers are to be sent across the Pacific. Thirty-five thousand are to go over. Seventy thousand ought to cross the Pacific before the 1st of July; and here are men discussing worn-out theses, things settled in the time of the Constitution, settled over and over again, and in fact they have been so thoroughly settled that the people had forgotten them but for this debate.

A very distinguished friend of mine, a doctor of divinity and at the same time really a statesman, was listening to a debate a good deal like this one day, and some one said, "What would you do if the President should do so and so?" He said, "Send a constable after him." That is what he would do—send a United States marshal after the President, summon him to a trial of impeachment, and turn him out dishonorably and disgracefully. The American people are strong enough for that, but they will never have occasion for it.

Fellow-Senators, I beg you to let this bill proceed and go through. I look with impatience on useless debate.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. HAWLEY. No, thank you. You have occupied half the time this morning, and more. You are capable of occupying the rest.

Mr. BACON. I beg pardon.

Mr. HAWLEY. I want to see the bill passed, and the work of raising troops to relieve the poor boys in the Philippines go on with rapidity. The War Department has begun to bring them over. They began, I think, with a vessel on the 15th of December. There are one or two vessels to come soon, one on the 1st and one on the 15th, as fast as possible, and they are relying upon us here to give them the means of supplying the deficiencies. We shall soon be where we can not bring even the sick boys back.

The earlier ships were filled with men utterly broken down or so nearly broken down that it was not worth while to keep them in the service. Charitably and gently and kindly the Government is picking them out to send them home. We can bring great distress upon this country very easily. We have nothing to do but to talk for a few months, and that we can all do, we know. That is all we have to do. Take the defense of our rights and our duties, our trusteeship of a wild and savage people and make it a farce and then see what a chapter you will have written in history. I care nothing about these questions. I want the money and I want the order to raise the troops to supply the deficiencies and put down our enemies and keep our flag where it is and maintain our honor.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, a very few words on this proposition. I confess I do not see very much of gravity in any of the questions which have been discussed here in relation to this bill which seem to oppress my friend the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], nor am I at all disquieted by any of those fears which seem to disquiet him. I have no fear, for one, that the Constitution is losing, anywhere or with anyone, its hold upon the people of this country. I think there has never been a time when there was more universal devotion to it than there is to-day, and the Senator from Georgia must not think—and I do not think he does—that those of us who favor this bill are willing to fasten upon the people the burden and expense of an unnecessary standing army.

I do not remember a time when there have not been patriotic men and able men and worthy men who did not see in some direction evidence of the destruction of our Constitution and our liberties. That apprehended evil has not come and it will not come. We may differ about the Constitution. We do differ about it. We all take the same oath to support it, however, and labor here for a common purpose; but when the limitations upon the Constitution and our differences of construction are settled by the tribunal which is created by the Constitution for that purpose, we all of us yield adherence to it and acquiesce in it.

The framers of the Constitution knew what dangers and burdens are involved in a large standing army. They knew what it had been in the country from which they came, and they did not intend that the people of the United States should be unnecessarily burdened in that way. They placed a restriction in the Constitution—not upon the President. They had no reference to George Washington or any succeeding President. They entertained no doubt as to the President, apparently. But they did entertain some doubt about the wisdom of Congress in the years to come.

They did not seem to think Congress would be the highest possible safeguard, under all circumstances, in respect of the Army, because the restriction which they placed in the Constitution upon that subject is a restriction upon Congress. They gave to Congress the power to raise and support armies, but lest Congress might put upon the country an unnecessary standing army they restricted the power of Congress in this wise: They provided that "no appropriation of money to that use shall continue for a longer period than two years."

Every two years the people elect a House of Representatives, in which these bills in practice originate. Every two years the people pass upon the fidelity and the judgment of their Representatives, and every two years the Congress, fresh from the people, is confronted with the question as to how large the Army shall be and how large the appropriation shall be. So, under the Constitution, the question as to an army is with the people, and there never can be under it for a period longer than two years a larger Army than the people consider necessary and desirable.

The Senator said the people were not awakened on this subject. The question of militarism was much discussed during the last campaign, and discussed upon the basis, also, of a recommendation by the President of the United States heretofore for a Regular Army of a hundred thousand men, and if ever there was evidence that the people—I do not take it as controlling at all—would not regard a hundred thousand men as excessive in the circumstances of to-day, we have had it as the result of the last election.

But, Mr. President, it is strange to me that Senators assert that Congress abdicates its function to the President, violates the Constitution, by fixing a maximum and a minimum for the Regular Army, with authority in the President to enlarge or decrease within the legal limits. We say it shall not be below fifty-two or fifty-three thousand; it shall not be above a hundred thousand.

There is flexibility in it. It is designed to meet emergencies, and there are emergencies which Congress does not foresee. None of us thought when Congress adjourned that it would become necessary for the President to send quickly two regiments of troops and a battery of artillery to China to protect the flag of the United States there from actual assault and the men who represent this Government there and their wives and their children from destruction. Exigencies will come. If we could foresee them always it would be well, but we can not.

The notion that nothing of discretion should be committed to the President has not, in my judgment, a sound foundation. There has been upon the statute book since 1795 a law giving large discretion to the President of the United States as to the militia. (Rev. Stat., sec. 1642.) The framers of the Constitution did not intend to leave it to an arbitrary determination by Congress each time as to what forces should be called into the field to protect the United States or to maintain and enforce the sovereignty of the United States within its own limits. They gave to the Congress the power "to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions."

In the exercise and discharge of that power Congress provided that the President should have power to call out the militia to repel invasions and to suppress insurrections; and within ten days after we adjourned on the 4th day of March, under that law which has been in existence almost as long as the Government has been in existence, the President can call a million men into the Army, volunteers, militia, compelling Congress when it met to pay for its services during those nine months, and to him alone it is left to determine the exigency and the number of men necessary to meet that exigency.

I agree entirely with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] that if the President, under the provisions of this bill, if it shall become a law shall raise the Army to the maximum, even though when Congress met we disagree with him as to the necessity, we would be obliged to pay the men called into the service, and so we would be obliged, under this old law, to pay the million men called for nine months into the service, even though when Congress met we were of the opinion that there was no exigency at all or that 50,000 men would have met completely the exigency. This power never has been abused in the history of this country. It never will be, I think it is safe to assume.

But it is not an unpatriotic or an unwise thing for us, legislating for a Regular Army, to keep in mind—that is all there is of it—that such exigencies may arise in the vacation calling for immediate action upon the part of the President and demanding the immediate use, in defense of the United States and its honor or for the maintenance of its laws and its sovereignty, of troops not already mustered under authority of Congress. During the Spanish-American war I think it will be agreed that as rapidly as possible men not needed were mustered out of the service, and so I think it will be hereafter.

Now, under this bill we are not providing that the President may raise such a Regular Army as he chooses. We are not leaving it to him to determine, without discretion or limit, the number of men who shall be brought into the Regular Army. We are placing that limit upon the Regular Army ourselves. We are fixing the size of the Regular Army. The President has not the power, nor is he given by this bill discretion, to add one man to the Regular Army above the limitation which we fix for the Regular Army. The only discretionary power that is given to him, and that is limited under the bill, in my judgment, is to meet an exigency which suddenly arises or to maintain the maximum until the present exigencies shall have passed away.

Mr. President, the minimum and maximum limit provided for in the bill I think of very great value, for we will have under it an educated and accomplished staff not too large for the minimum or too small for the maximum.

It is wise, in the public interest, and it is safe to leave some discretion in the President of the United States. I care not whether he belongs to my party or to some other party. He is chosen by the people. He rests under a solemn obligation, as we do, and I never yet have legislated upon the assumption or upon the theory that he may abuse a discretion, or that he will abuse a discretion which we confer upon him, for this Army, whether it is the minimum or the maximum, is an Army raised by the Congress and limited by the Congress.

The Senator would prefer, and I can understand easily the argument by which he would support that proposition, a temporary provision for present exigencies. I think that would be extremely unwise. That would be an attempt on the part of Congress practically to express the legislative opinion that an insurrection in the Philippines, if you please, would last a year or it would last two years. It would tend to incite their resistance and a prolongation of it, in my judgment. Moreover, under a temporary provision we might find ourselves again, as to troops for the Philippines, in the unfortunate situation which now embarrasses us.

I may be mistaken about it, but it might at least have that effect. I think it is wise for its moral effect as well wise in itself that we should provide, in creating a reorganization of the Regular Army, for a permanent plan, flexible in its character, enabling the Government, it always being in the hand of Congress, to bring it to the minimum or to increase it to the maximum as the public exigency demands it.

I have not heard it said here that the minimum is excessive. I have not heard my friend from Georgia, who is a patriotic and able man, intimate, so far as I remember, that the minimum is excessive.

Mr. BACON. I think it is.

Mr. SPOONER. Very well. I think it is not.

Mr. BACON. I will give my reasons afterwards if I have an opportunity.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator will undoubtedly have an opportunity. I wish to call attention for a moment to what the President says upon that subject. It has not been read in the debate and it is brief:

The present strength of the Army is 100,000 men—65,000 regulars and 35,000 volunteers. Under the act of March 2, 1899, on the 30th of June next the present volunteer force will be discharged and the Regular Army will be reduced to 2,447 officers and 29,025 enlisted men.

That makes some action from two standpoints necessary. Everyone will admit that.

In 1888 a board of officers convened by President Cleveland adopted a comprehensive scheme of coast-defense fortifications which involved the outlay of something over $100,000,000.

Mr. ALLISON. One hundred and twenty-six million dollars.

Mr. SPOONER. My friend from Iowa says $126,000,000.

This plan received the approval of the Congress, and since then regular appropriations have been made and the work of fortification has steadily progressed.

Mr. BACON. On what page does the Senator read?

Mr. SPOONER. I read from page 37 of the President's annual message.

More than $60,000,000 have been invested in a great number of forts and guns, with all the complicated and scientific machinery and electrical appliances necessary for their use. The proper care of this defensive machinery requires men trained in its use.

And I suppose the people of the United States desire this artillery and these fortifications preserved and cared for just as other public works and property in which their money has been expended throughout the country.

Mr. CAFFERY. What number would the Army have to be increased to make that force efficient?

Mr. SPOONER. I will get to that in a moment.

The number of men necessary to perform this duty alone is ascertained by the War Department, at a minimum allowance, to be 18,420.

There are 58 or more military posts in the United States other than the coast-defense fortifications.

The number of these posts is being constantly increased by the Congress.

There has been great pressure, and there will be pressure, from time to time, in different parts of the country, notably from the far West, for Army posts.

More than $22,000,000—

The President says—

have been expended in building and equipment, and they can only be cared for by the Regular Army. The posts now in existence and others to be built provide for accommodations for, and if fully garrisoned require, 25,000 troops. Many of these posts are along our frontier or at important strategic points the occupation of which is necessary.

We have in Cuba between 5,000 and 6,000 troops. For the present our troops in that island can not be withdrawn or materially diminished, and certainly not until the conclusion of the labors of the constitutional convention now in session and a government provided by the new constitution shall have been established and its stability assured.

In Porto Rico we have reduced the garrisons to 1,636, which includes 879 native troops. There is no room for further reduction here.

Then the President says:

We will be required to keep a considerable force in the Philippine Islands for some time to come. From the best information obtainable we will need there for the immediate future from 45,000 to 60,000 men. I am sure the number may be reduced as the insurgents shall come to acknowledge the authority of the United States, of which there are assuring indications.

Leaving out the forces required for the Philippines, the men required would be 51,056.

Mr. TELLER. How many? Twenty-six and eighteen?

Mr. SPOONER. Twenty-six and eighteen added to 5,000 in Cuba, and I add the 1,636 in Porto Rico.

Mr. TELLER. That is outside.

Mr. SPOONER. I am adding everything except what is required in the Philippines. I do not think my figures are inaccurate, but possibly they may be.

Now, Mr. President, with this minimum and maximum limit it will be in the power of the President to reduce the Army below the maximum.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. The Philippine Commission, through Judge Taft, I believe, reported in October that by the 1st of January instant the insurrection, or whatever it may be called, would be practically at an end, and there would be scarcely any troops needed after that time.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not know that. I do not remember to have seen such a dispatch. The insurrection is undoubtedly not what it was. I have very good reasons for the belief that it is now not much more in many places than a conspiracy to plunder and murder.

Mr. ALLEN. I suppose it will be scarcely denied that such a dispatch was sent, because it was published as official.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not know whether it was sent or not, for I did not see it, and I do not care whether it was sent or not. I apprehend that no man in the present situation there would be willing to withdraw the great body of our troops and leave 10,000 or 15,000 there, possibly to be overwhelmed or destroyed. I think it a clear proposition also that in the Philippines, when the insurrection shall have ended, it will require a large number of soldiers to safeguard the interests of that people as well as our own, standing in the relation to that people as we do, until there shall have been formed there a stable government and an arrangement shall have been made there for the native enforcement of the law and the protection of life and liberty and property.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator——

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I do not intend to become involved, in the few words which I wish to say, in any discussion of the Philippine question.

Mr. ALLEN. Of course, I will not insist upon putting my question to the Senator if he objects.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not object to the question, but it is apart from this subject.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask the Senator if he has any information in his possession which permits a forecast of the probable time when the insurrection will end?

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I think that is a wise question, probably, but one who attempted to answer it would be guilty of supreme folly. It is in the very nature of things impossible from my standpoint for any man definitely to forecast it.

Mr. ALLEN. How long does the Senator think it will last?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not know how long it will last, and therefore I will not undertake to say. It may last a year; it may last longer; I do not know. I am not in the confidence of the insurgents there. I do not know what their plans are.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. I only know this, Mr. President, that until it shall have ended, and so long as our troops are there, or any portion of our troops are there, we should have an adequate force to protect them and to enable them to protect the people in the archipelago.

Mr. ALLEN. What prompted my question was this: I understood the Senator to say a moment ago that he had reason to believe that the insurrection was practically collapsing at this time, and therefore I took it for granted that he could forecast that it would collapse within a reasonable time.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not in the forecasting business, Mr. President, about matters with which I have no personal or definite knowledge or information. I think the insurrection has very largely been disintegrated; but I think all through that archipelago are bands of armed men intent upon plunder. I think it is as necessary to maintain the force there now as it has been at any time. I should very much fear that if the Army were cut down there, even though there were apparently little insurrection, it might break out anew, and especially in view of the information which has been given to the Senate within the last two days from that country. I believe what the President said in his annual message as to the necessity for troops in the Philippines.

Mr. CAFFERY. Will the Senator permit me to ask him whether the insurrection has not been put down, and that the only persons engaged are organized marauders against the Filipinos themselves? Does he not think that under those conditions the Filipinos would put down any marauders without any assistance from our troops?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not know that they would. They have not been organized yet for that purpose. There is a proposition in this bill to organize twelve native regiments. I think it can be done. I think it is wise to do it. I object to the provision in the bill in regard to their compensation, which it is proposed shall be one-half of the pay of the soldiers of the United States who are serving there now. I intend when the proper time comes to strike out the words "one-half," so that those men may have the same pay and allowances as enlisted men in our regiments there.

Mr. CAFFERY. Will the Senator permit me to ask him whether he shares in the opinion which I have heard expressed by many, that the whole Filipino race is savage and practically a cruel race and pursues inhuman methods of warfare? Does he share in that opinion?

Mr. SPOONER. I have seen some evidences that a portion of the Filipinos pursue cruel and inhuman methods of warfare. I have distinctly more than once from my place in the Senate declared that I did not place the estimate upon the Filipino people as a whole which the Senator indicates.

Mr. CAFFERY. There are a good many of them of the character, however, which has been given to them here of savagery and inhumanity, are there not, in your opinion?

Mr. SPOONER. I did not understand the Senator.

Mr. CAFFERY. There are a great many who possess this character of savagery and inhumanity, according to your opinion?

Mr. SPOONER. Undoubtedly, some of them. I do not know how many.

Mr. CAFFERY. Then I would ask the Senator whether he thinks it is humane to employ such inhuman agents as these Filipinos even to put down the Filipinos themselves?

Mr. SPOONER I do not believe that savages will be enlisted in our regiments. I suppose the natives who are enlisted will be men approved by the officers over there, who know them and who select them.

Mr. CAFFERY. It is pretty hard to get these gentle Filipinos.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator can not put words in my mouth, and I do not think he endeavored to do so.

Mr. CAFFERY. Oh, not at all.

Mr. SPOONER. I refer to the statement that the Filipinos as a whole are savage and inhuman people. I have distinctly announced an opinion otherwise hitherto more than once.

Mr. MONEY. Will the Senator from Wisconsin permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. MONEY. The Senator was a moment ago stating his opinion of the necessity of a large number of troops being stationed in the islands. I ask him if he agrees with General MacArthur, who is now in command there and who is supposed to be the best judge of the number of troops required, his estimate being 100,000 as necessary, I believe; does the Senator agree with the General in that respect?

Mr. SPOONER. I take the recommendation of the War Department and the President upon that subject.

Mr. MONEY. You do not agree, then, with General MacArthur, who is in command there?

Mr. SPOONER. I have no personal knowledge on the subject upon which to base an opinion. I know that the War Department is in a position to investigate the subject carefully, to test the accuracy of General MacArthur's opinion by the opinion of other officers serving there, and I am prepared to accept as nearly correct as it can well be, under the circumstances, the opinion of the War Department and the opinion of the President upon the subject.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly. I do not want to take so much time, however.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to know if the Senator knows how many soldiers we have got out there now?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not.

Mr. TELLER. I want to know if he thinks we have got any too many out there?

Mr. SPOONER. I doubt if we have.

Mr. TELLER. If he will allow me, I will state to him that the Secretary of War said that we have 71,000 men there.

Mr. BURROWS. We have 71,000 there now.

Mr. SPOONER. Well, a great many of them are on their way back. I want to give to the President the troops that are necessary, and I think the American people want us to give to the President the troops that are necessary to meet the exigency there and to meet any exigency which may confront this country.

Mr. President, nothing is clearer to my mind—I know Senators differ with me upon that subject—than that in fixing a minimum and a maximum, leaving the President to exercise his judgment between the extremes as to what the interest of the country demands, we are simply doing a plain duty. I have no fear that the power will be abused or the discretion will be exercised except in the public interest; and, as has been said so many times here, we have it always in our hands and under our control, not simply in the appropriation bills, but we have the power to pass an amendment to this law at any time we choose declaring that the maximum of the Army shall be 50,000 men, and requiring the mustering out of the service of the excess.

It is absolutely impossible for Congress to disable itself upon this subject. It is not one of those statutes under which there can be any vested rights. It is entirely under our control, and it s not any more a question, therefore, whether we can safely trust the President as it is a question whether we can safely trust ourselves.

Mr. MONEY. That is exactly what I am afraid of.

Mr. SPOONER. I have no fear, Mr. President, that we can not safely trust ourselves, and I hope the people will have no occasion for fearing that they can not safely trust us. One thing is certain, that the body which originates these bills comes every two years fresh from the people.

Mr. ALLEN. But it did not originate the pending bill.

Mr. SPOONER. I know, but in practice from the beginning it has originated the Army appropriation bill, and that will continue to be so.

Mr. ALLEN. There is no constitutional objection to the Senate originating it.

Mr. SPOONER. Perhaps not, but I apprehend that during the life of the country the rule that has been acquiesced in by the Senate will hardly be changed.

Mr. ALLEN. Does the Senator think that if the President desired a continuance of the Army at a maximum Congress should reduce it?

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, if the President of the United States desired the continuance of the Army at a maximum, giving, as he would, his reasons for that recommendation, I do not suppose for one moment that the Senate and the House of Representatives would blindly yield to that recommendation.

Mr. ALLEN. But suppose an exigency arose?

Mr. SPOONER. I suppose if the Senator were here and there was a Democratic President——

Mr. ALLEN. I am not a Democrat.

Mr. SPOONER. Well, a Populistic President——

Mr. ALLEN. That is correct.

Mr. SPOONER. Who recommended that the Army be kept at its maximum, the Senator would examine the President's reasons and he would determine for himself whether they were sufficient or not.

Mr. ALLEN. I should dislike to trust myself under the circumstances.

Mr. SPOONER. I would be willing to trust the Senator as I would be willing to trust all the Senators, and as I would be willing to trust this body. I can not believe it possible that the Congress of the United States will ever, in matters of legislation as to the Army or any other subject, become blindly subservient to any President.

Mr. ALLEN. Has the Senator known of a case since the days of Andrew Johnson where the President's party was in power in Congress and refused to follow his wishes?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not know that I can file any bill of particulars, but I am certain——

Mr. ALLEN. Here is my distinguished friend from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], who was in Congress at that time. Perhaps he can enlighten us on the subject. What I mean to assert is that no President since the days of Andrew Johnson has ever suggested to his party a policy involving legislation that that party did not follow.

Mr. SPOONER. I have a faint recollection that while Mr. Cleveland was President of the United States he made a suggestion to his party on the financial question which his party, which was in control of both Houses, did not follow.

Mr. MONEY. They did follow him then, but afterwards repudiated him.

Mr. SPOONER. They followed him as to the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act, with the assistance of the Republican Senators who had voted for it.

Mr. ALLEN. My friend will not trifle with me; I do not want to be unnecessarily interrupted. Whenever, in the course of politics, the same party being dominant in both branches of Congress and dominant in the executive department, the Executive makes a suggestion of policy to be pursued by the enactment of a given law, and Congress yields to his wishes, does it not, for practical purposes, put the whole question in the hands of the Executive?

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, the assumption is a discreditable one to Congress. If the time ever comes when Congress will abdicate its functions, when the Senate and House of Representatives, in regard to the Army bill or any other important matter, refuse to think and become absolutely subject to the domination of a President, it will be a sorry day for this country.

Mr. ALLEN. I admit that. But is it not true that the Congress of the dominant party does follow the policy of the President?

Mr. SPOONER. No; it is not true; and many, many times the President has recommended legislation——

Mr. MONEY. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but——

Mr. SPOONER. Let me finish my sentence.

Mr. MONEY. Very well.

Mr. SPOONER. Many times within my recollection the President has recommended legislation which Congress did not enact. We are all here as representatives of the people in one way or another. The President has his functions, and we have ours. Under the Constitution the President does not enact laws, and there will never be a one-man power in this country, as to any matter within the domain of legislation, until this Government has become an absolute failure, and until the great body of members of both Houses have forgotten their oaths.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator gets away from the question.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not get away from it. The Senator seems to fear this bill being enacted into law for the reason that he assumes that, if once enacted into law, it never will be changed, even if it ought to be changed, by Congress, if the President wants it to remain as it is. I repudiate that.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator gets away from the question. I hope he will let me recall it to him. I am speaking now of practical politics. I am not talking about constitutional powers.

Mr. SPOONER. This is not a town meeting or a political meeting.

Mr. ALLEN. Sometimes it very nearly turns itself into both. Can the Senator recall any instances in a Republican Administration since the days of Andrew Johnson when a Congress dominant with the President has refused to carry out any policy he suggested?

Mr. SPOONER. If that be true, I suppose it has been because they agreed with the President.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well. So they have, on many questions regarding the repeal of certain laws which involved a change of policy, followed the President in his course.

Mr. SPOONER. Not when they disagreed with his views, so far as I remember. I disagree entirely with that. Are we not here confronted with this question every time we meet, and have we not every time thrust in our faces the question as to the size of the Army? We can not escape it; and every two years the question is carried to the people.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator will pardon me, here seems to be an illustration of the point at issue. Congress in 1878, in passing the Army bill, put in section 15, prohibiting the President of the United States from using the Army as a posse comitatus. When President Cleveland violated this express statute by sending the Army out to Chicago, what did Congress do?

Mr. SCOTT. He never violated it.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator from North Carolina adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska and assume that hereafter, so long as there is a Republican President and a Republican majority in both Houses, whatever a President wishes will be done, whether Congress thinks it wise or not?

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I should regret very much to believe that, and I should hesitate to admit it if I did believe it, because it would be a repudiation practically, or an expression of a loss of faith in our Government. We are met, however, with certain facts which we can not shut our eyes to. One of them, to which I was about to refer, was when Congress legislated to prohibit the President of the United States from using the Army except for Army purposes. Then, when President Cleveland, in violation, or what seems to me to be a plain violation, of the letter of the law, sent the Army to Chicago, and was criticised by the press, what did this body do?

A distinguished member of his own party, who voted for this very law, feeling that the President was criticised justly, and had no doubt violated the law, arose in this body and offered a resolution indorsing the course of President Cleveland, and this body passed the resolution. Now, the Senator, feeling that Congress had repealed that law by the adoption of the resolution, and that Congress, in indorsing the action of President Cleveland, had winked at a violation of the law, has offered as an amendment to this bill the same provision which is already on the statute book. That seems to me to be apropos and to be an illustration in point. I hope he will look at it as an exception and not as a rule, but yet it is the fact.

Does not the Senator recognize the distinction and the difference between enacting a law and repealing a law? Is Congress not freer, at least, in acting on a suggestion of the Executive in enacting a law than in repealing one? Then, is it not easier? When you go to repeal a law, you must have all three branches of the Government agree. We may have on the statute book an undesirable law, a law of which a majority of the American people disapprove, a law which two branches of the Government disapprove, and yet one branch of the Government can keep it on the statute book.

Is it not better to keep ourselves in a position where we can act affirmatively, where we can act with our reason, and not where one branch of the Government, the House or the Senate, or the President, when the other branches are probably overwhelmingly in favor of it, can put a veto upon it? The Senate might side with the President, or the House and the Senate might decide, but the President could veto the action of Congress.

So we are changing the precedents; we are changing the rules, and we are changing what seems to be——

Mr. SPOONER. I thought the Senator rose to ask me a question.

Mr. BUTLER. I will not interrupt any further.

Mr. SPOONER. I will allow the Senator to finish his sentence.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask the Senator's pardon for making some remarks after asking the question.

Mr. SPOONER. The resolution to which the Senator refers was not legislation, but it was an expression of opinion by the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. That is true.

Mr. SPOONER. As to the propriety of the use made of troops by the President Cleveland, I believe there was not much difference of opinion between the parties in the Senate. I do not remember. I was not a member of the Senate at that time.

Mr. BUTLER. I will say that there seems to have been some logrolling on it, and there was an effort to have no yea-and-nay vote. When a yea-and-nay vote was called for by, I think, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], he was appealed to, if I remember correctly, not to do that, as there seemed to be some general understanding not to go on record; they wanted to support the President, but nobody wanted to have the yeas and nays called.

Mr. SPOONER. It was a mere opinion of the Senate, I understand, upon an act of the President, and if I had been here I should have voted for the resolution.

Mr. MONEY. If the Senator will allow me to answer the question, I should be glad to do it, but I do not want to interrupt him.

Mr. SPOONER. In a moment. I rose to speak but a few minutes, and I do not want to take up too much time.

Mr. MONEY. All right.

Mr. SPOONER. I decline for one—other Senators, of course, will do as they choose—to base my action upon the bill upon the assumption that hereafter, if I happen to be a member of this body and think a law ought to be repealed, I will be such a subservient tool and such a moral coward and so utterly faithless to the people whom I represent here as not to be able to vote for its repeal.

I assume—and that is the only assumption in harmony with the dignity and decency of Congress—that if we enact laws which we deem wise from the standpoint of to-day, and later we think they should be repealed, Congress will have the intelligence and the courage to repeal them. I will not base any action of mine upon this bill or any other bill upon the assumption that Congress is ever to become a mere register of the decrees or the will of another department.

This bill, as I read it, without the amendments proposed by the Senator from Georgia, means this: A bill, of course, when it becomes a law, is in its construction to be considered as a whole; one part of it will not be considered independently of the other parts. My understanding of the bill is that this power of the President to increase from the minimum to the maximum the artillery, the cavalry, and the infantry is entirely controlled, as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] insisted it is, by the general provision of the statute authorizing the President to maintain the Army at the maximum during the present exigency or until Congress shall otherwise direct.

I think another thing. I think as the bill is drawn, if the words "or until Congress shall otherwise direct" be stricken out, that when the President shall have reduced the Army, the present emergency having passed and no other quickly succeeding it, he will not have the power to again raise it to the maximum without Congressional authority; and I am not sure that that limitation is a wise one. I think we may safely trust any President when the exigency demands it—and of course he must be the judge—to raise the Army from the minimum to the maximum, or approximating the maximum, so far as he thinks the public necessity may require it.

Anyway, this bill gives the President the power if the Philippine emergency shall have passed, if Cuba shall have established her government and become independent, if native troops are adequate in Porto Rico, if nothing threatens the country, to reduce the Army to the minimum; and I have no doubt that any President would be prompt to exercise that power and reduce the Army to the minimum.

Mr. BACON. I ask for information. Where does the Senator find that power to reduce?

Mr. SPOONER. I find that power in section 26.

Mr. BACON. Inferentially.

Mr. SPOONER. I think when Congress says the President is authorized to maintain the Army at the maximum until the present emergency shall have passed, that is a sufficiently plain declaration that when the present emergency shall have passed the Army shall be reduced to the minimum. That could possibly be made plainer, of course, but I do not think it need be plainer. I doubt if that limitation should be in there at all, because of the uncertainty as to the exigencies which may arise, the matter being all the time within the control of Congress, and the President presumably desiring to save expense to the people as much as we.

I am not ready to believe—I may be too much of an optimist; I think I am not—that we shall have a President who will be willing at any time to fasten upon the people the burden of expense involved in maintaining 50,000 unnecessary soldiers. No man in this Chamber would do it if he were President, and I think no President would do it.

So far as I am concerned, Mr. President, I believe the minimum required is a reasonable one. I think the maximum leaves an Army flexible and elastic to meet emergencies. Some Senators seem to think that if there were an emergency Congress should be called immediately together. It was not the opinion—and I wish to bring the attention of Senators to the fact—of the early statesmen of the country that that would be an adequate resource in case of necessity.

That might have been said against the act which in 1795 was passed, giving the President the power immediately, without limit as to the number, to call into the Army, to be paid out of the Treasury, the militia for nine months. It was thought then—and there is infinitely more danger of it now than there was then—that invasion or insurrection might be so sudden that prompt and immediate action upon the part of the President might be necessary in order to safeguard the interests of this people.

I find nothing of constitutional objection in the bill; I find nothing of bad policy in it; I find nothing of dangerous precedent in it, and, certainly, I find in that portion of it which leaves some discretion to the President, within the limits fixed by Congress, nothing objectionable.

Mr. BUTLER. Before the Senator takes his seat, I should like to inquire why we would not accomplish everything that the present emergency requires, and overcome every objection which has been raised to having an army for one, two, or three years, and thus, as has been claimed, encourage the Filipinos to fight, by simply providing that the President should have an army of 100,000 soldiers until the Philippine insurrection is suppressed. What is the objection to that? Why would not that meet every requirement?

Mr. SPOONER. That is very indefinite. I see no improvement in that suggestion over the provisions contained in the bill. I believe myself that a maximum of 100,000 men, who can be called into service by the President, is not too large an army for this country. I think it will be kept at this minimum whenever peace prevails; I think it will be raised to the maximum only when necessary.

Mr. BUTLER. Still, in time of peace we will have an army of 100,000 men.

Mr. SPOONER. I think in times of peace we will have the minimum. I think if there should arise a sudden emergency, which demanded more than the minimum, it would be well to have the power upon the statute book quickly to raise it to the maximum.

Mr. BUTLER. But we have no emergency now but the Philippine question, and Congress can certainly legislate for future emergencies.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not talking about the present emergency; but when other emergencies arise.

Mr. BUTLER. We legislate always when they do arise.

Mr. SPOONER. You do not always legislate when they do arise. When war arose in China Congress was not in session; and other emergencies may arise when we are not in session.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator would agree to keep an army of 100,000 men?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not say that. We are not providing for a compulsory Army of 100,000 men; we are providing for an elastic Army; we are placing a minimum and a maximum limit, and we are allowing the President, subject to our power at every session to change it, in the exercise of his judgment as to the necessities of the country, to raise it from the minimum to the maximum.

Mr. BUTLER. Then why not limit the maximum to simply the continuance of the Philippine trouble, and then let the Army go back to the minimum until Congress can legislate? Why not state that specifically?

Mr. SPOONER. With the words "or until Congress shall otherwise direct" I think it does sufficiently limit it.

Mr. BUTLER. Other Senators think to the contrary.

Mr. SPOONER. No; I have heard no expression to the contrary.

Mr. BUTLER. I will say that the Senator is the only Senator on that side whom I have heard express that opinion.

Mr. SPOONER. I have expressed that opinion a half dozen times.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, I have not trespassed upon the Senate's time or attention with reference to this measure, and I do not now intend to consume more than a sufficient time to briefly state my position in regard to this bill and my reasons for that position.

After the ratification of the treaty whereby the Philippine Islands were annexed as a portion of the territory of the United States, I recognized the fact that it behooved this Government to establish and maintain its sovereignty over every portion of those islands; and I hold it now to be my duty as a member of this body to do all I can conscientiously toward the realization of that end.

While I deplore the necessity which has brought about the situation that now exists, I nevertheless recognize the obligation on me at least to do all that my intelligence indicates I ought to do to bring about a condition of things in that territory whereby the sovereignty of the Government of the United States will be undisputed. Therefore, Mr. President, I have no hesitation in saying that I am willing to give my vote for the purpose of assembling a force in those islands adequate to the purpose of suppressing opposition to the power of the United States Government, whatever that force may be. I do not myself undertake to fix the number, but as nearly two years ago 100,000 men were thought a sufficiency for that purpose, so again, if 100,000 men are a sufficiency, I am willing to vote for that 100,000 men, or if a larger number of men is necessary for the accomplishment of the purpose, I am willing to vote even for a larger number of men.

But, Mr. President, while I am willing to do that, I can not support this bill. I do not see in the exigency which is now presented to us any excuse or any reason for the people of the United States to turn their backs upon the traditions of the past and to take the tremendous, the unprecedented step which is contemplated by this piece of legislation.

There are some grounds of grave constitutional objections to the principle embodied in this bill presented to thoughtful men, because the Constitution has vested in Congress, and in Congress alone, the power to raise and support armies, and it has been careful to even put a limitation upon Congress itself to prevent it from establishing and undertaking to maintain an army for a greater period than two years; but under the provisions of this bill it is proposed, at the least, to nearly double the Regular Army of the United States. That of itself is a long stride; it is a longer stride than has ever before been made in the history of this country.

But, in addition to that, the bill proposes to vest in the President of the United States the discretionary power, in one instance entirely untrammeled, and in the other qualified by the provision that it shall endure so long as the present exigencies exist—it proposes to confer upon the President that untrammeled power to increase the Army of the United States from the figure of 50,000 men, to put it in round numbers, to 100,000 men.

I took the infantry provision in this bill and figured as to what change could be wrought in the condition of the Army if the President chose to avail himself of the discretion that is vested in him by the section covering that portion of the Army. Under the minimum provision each company of infantry shall consist of "1 first sergeant, 1 quartermaster-sergeant, 4 sergeants, 6 corporals, 2 cooks, 2 musicians, 1 artificer, and 48 privates," but the President, in his discretion, without any qualification as to what that discretion shall be gauged by, "may increase the number of sergeants in any company of infantry to 6, the number of corporals to 10, and the number of privates to 127, but the total number of enlisted men authorized for the whole Army shall not at any time be exceeded."

I figured as to what was the meaning of this provision when put in practical operation, and I find that under the minimum rule the infantry, consisting of 30 regiments, will amount to 23,400 men, and, when raised to its maximum, in the discretion of the President, it will be composed of 53,280. That single arm of the service will be increased considerably more than twofold at the President's discretion.

In view of the constitutional provision which gives Congress, and Congress alone, the power to raise and support armies, does it not seem that this is a long stride in opposition to the principle embodied in that provision? If the raising of the number of the Army from twenty-three thousand and odd to fifty-three thousand and odd is not equivalent to the raising of an additional army, I fail to understand what an additional army is.

But, Mr. President, passing aside from the details of the measure, I would ask those gentlemen who favor, and favor so earnestly, its enactment to give us one good reason why the standing Regular Army should be increased to a hundred thousand men. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the arguments that have been put forth here and to the reasons which have been assigned as a justification for this tremendous increase in the fighting force of the country.

One gentleman has declared that it is eminently desirable that the standing Army should be increased, because if we repeat that which we did on March 2, 1899, by simply providing for a temporary increase of the Army, it will give aid and comfort to the Filipinos and will impress them with the idea that the United States is not seriously intending to suppress the insurrection in those islands. I take it, in view of the fact that Congress at its best can make appropriations for the maintainence of the Army for only two years in advance, that the apprehension that our raising an army, which of itself is to endure for two years but which Congress can continue from time to time, as in its discretion seems best, would not be any more of an incentive to hope on the part of our Filipino insurrectionists than would be the calling of their attention to the fact that Congress is without power to make an appropriation for an army for a longer period than two years.

Another very eminent member of this body has assigned as a reason why we should branch forth upon this new military career that we are expanding in a most phenomenal way, that our trade and commerce are reaching forth to the utmost ends of the earth, and that no one can tell at what moment some exigency may arise which will require the United States to exert its full power in order to protect our commerce and trade. That may be, Mr. President, but the mere suspicion or the mere assertion of such a suspicion fails to carry any weight with me.

I take it, Mr. President, that it is not the purpose or intent of the people of the United States to use a standing army for the purpose of enlarging their commercial sphere of action. I take it that the United States has too often observed the calamitous results of such efforts on the part of other nations; and if we wanted an object lesson of the wrong and the injustice which can be done under such a pretext, we could not have a better one than is presented to us to-day by what is transpiring in South Africa.

If ever there was a commercial war, if ever there was war inspired and brought about and which has been conducted on purely commercial principles, it is that war which England is now waging with such terrible ferocity against the unhappy Boers. I trust, Mr. President, the people of the United States will never consent to use their Army, Regular or Volunteer, for such a purpose as that for which the English army is being employed by the Government of Great Britain in South Africa to-day.

As a specimen of the way in which that commercial propaganda is being carried on, I will read an extract from a letter from one of the Canadian volunteers which I found published in a Washington paper a few days ago. It is a letter from Belfast, South Africa. Lieutenant Morrison, of Ottawa, editor of the Ottawa Citizen, who was with the Canadian artillery there and has been recently mentioned in the dispatches for gallant conduct in action, describes the march through Steilpoort Valley, North of Belfast. He says, among other things, in describing the destruction of a settlement:

> First there was an ominous bluish haze over the town, and then the smoke rolled up in volumes that could be seen for 50 miles away. The Boers on the hills seemed paralyzed by the sight and stopped shooting. When the lull came General Smith-Dorien invited the artillery officers to go down into the place with him on a sort of official appearance—"just tell them that you saw me" style of thing. The town was very quiet save for the roaring and crackle of the flames. On the steps of the church a group of women and children were huddled. The women's faces were very white, but some of them had spots of red on either cheek and their eyes were blazing.
> The troops were systematically looking the place over, and as they got quite through with each house they burned it. Our Canadian boys helped the women to get their furniture out with much the same concern as they would exhibit at a village fire at home. If they saw anything, however, they particularly fancied they would likely appropriate it ("muzzle not the ox that treadeth out the corn"), but they had not the callous nerve to take the people's stuff before their eyes. But you should have seen the Royal Irish on the loot. They helped the people out with their stuff by heaving bureaus bodily through the windows, putting pickaxes through melodeons, and such like wantonness. I heard one yell: "Begorry, Tim, here's a nice carpet. Oi think O'll take it home for the ould woman. Lind a hand here." R-r-r-rip! Up came a handsome pile carpet in strips. And so the work went on, the officers standing by laughing at the costly fun their men were having.
> As I stood looking, a woman, the owner of a very pretty little cottage standing in a rose garden on a side street which was being destroyed, turned to me and pathetically exclaimed, "Oh, how can you be so cruel?" I sympathized with her and explained that it was an order and had to be obeyed. But all the same it was an intensely sad sight to see the little homes burning and the rose bushes withering up in the pretty gardens, and the pathetic groups of homeless and distressed women and little children weeping in their abject misery and despair among the smoking ruins as we rode away.

That, Mr. President, is not an exaggerated picture of the scenes of a commercial war that are constantly occurring on that stage. I should certainly deprecate any tendency on the part of our people, merely for the purpose of spreading their avenues of commercial influence and trade, to undertake to compel by force of arms the submission of an unwilling people to a reception of their goods.

The same authority who has urged as a reason why we should have this unusually large standing Army also assigns as a cause the fact that we will ere long possibly be engaged in constructing a canal across the Central American Isthmus, and that it will be necessary for us to have troops enough to police the line of the proposed canal. It strikes me that a moment's reflection ought to convince anyone that that is hardly a sufficient reason for the United States to turn its back upon the past and to take this very important step. At the best, if a few thousand men were necessary for the purpose of policing the route of a proposed canal, a thing which heretofore has not been deemed necessary, I believe, either in the case of Panama or in the case of the Suez Canal, there would be no difficulty at the proper time in Congress providing an adequate force for that purpose.

Those are, I think, Mr. President, all the reasons that have been assigned by the very earnest and able advocates of the measure on this floor for the increase of the Regular Army. There has been no effort on the part of the committee in their report to give any reason at all other than their bald declaration that it is desirable; and as has been pointed out already by a Senator upon this floor, they devote by far the major portion of their report to the consideration of the question whether beer should or should not be sold at the Army posts of the land, failing to say one word why we should advance the Army from thirty thousand to a hundred thousand men and vest the President with an absolute discretion to make that advance at any time when he sees proper.

I have heard several very able and learned gentlemen, for whose opinions I have very much respect, express an opinion as to what is an adequate standing army for the United States. One Senator here, for whose judgment we all have a very high respect, has given it as his opinion that one soldier for every thousand inhabitants is about the correct thing; and I think the opinions of others that it should be one to about that number is the opinion that probably prevails in this body to-day. I do not think anyone can take an arbitrary basis for a judgment of that kind. What is the use of a standing army in this country? Why should the figure of one man to a thousand of the inhabitants be selected rather than one to two thousand or one to five hundred? It is purely arbitrary, unless we contemplate the object and purpose and reason of being of the Regular Army.

I take it there is no apprehension in the breast of any intelligent man in this country to-day that we have any reason to fear an invasion from any foreign power. We have no idea that Canada on the north or Mexico on the south presents any menace to the peace and dignity of the United States. And unless we have some apprehension from nations and people that are contiguous to our boundaries, what reason have we to apprehend that there will be an invasion of this country?

It would be a physical impossibility for any of the European nations to invade this country. When we reflect as to the time and the effort and the expense that would be necessary even to land an army of a hundred thousand men upon our shores, the suggestion that it is necessary for us to keep an army of that size in order to resist any possible invasion seems to me to be absurd. Consequently in the condition and situation of things as they are now I have failed to see any reason why there should be an increase of the standing Army to a hundred thousand men.

The opinions of gentlemen of the present day are undoubtedly entitled to consideration, but in investigating the matter to satisfy myself I ran across the opinion of one who lived in the days of the framers of the Constitution and who looked at the subject of standing armies for republics from the point of view at which stood the men who founded our institutions. I read, Mr. President, from the eighth number of the Federalist upon this point:

> There is a wide difference, also, between military establishments in a country seldom exposed by its situation to internal invasions and in one which is often subject to them and always apprehensive of them. The rulers of the former can have no good pretext, if they are even so inclined, to keep on foot armies so numerous as must of necessity be maintained in the latter.

In other words, the writer regards the necessity for a large or a small army as being entirely dependent upon the surrounding circumstances and the environments of that army. Again:

> In a country in the predicament last described the contrary of all this happens. The perpetual menacings of danger oblige the government to be always prepared to repel it; its armies must be numerous enough for instant defense. The continual necessity for their services enhances the importance of the soldier, and proportionably degrades the condition of the citizen. The military state becomes elevated above the civil. The inhabitants of territories often the theater of war are unavoidably subjected to frequent infringements on their rights which serve to weaken their sense of those rights, and by degrees the people are brought to consider the soldiery not only as their protectors, but as their superiors.
> The transition from this disposition to that of considering them as masters is neither remote nor difficult; but it is very difficult to prevail upon a people under such impressions to make a bold or effectual resistance to usurpations supported by the military power.

To anyone who has visited Germany, or, in fact, almost any of the continental nations, in recent years the truth of these objections and criticisms would seem to be almost prophetic. The writer, referring to Great Britain, says:

> The Kingdom of Great Britain falls within the first description. An insular situation and a powerful marine, guarding it in a great measure against the possibility of foreign invasion, supersede the necessity of a numerous army within the Kingdom. A sufficient force to make head against a sudden descent till the militia could have time to rally and embody is all that has been deemed requisite. No motive of national policy has demanded, nor would public opinion have tolerated, a larger number of troops upon its domestic establishment. There has been for a long time past little room for the operation of the other causes which have been enumerated as the consequences of internal war. This peculiar felicity of situation has in a great degree contributed to preserve the liberty which that country to this day enjoys in spite of the prevalent venality and corruption.

Again, applying this reasoning to our own position, he says:

> If we are wise enough to preserve the Union we may for ages enjoy an advantage similar to that of an insulated situation. Europe is at a great distance from us. Her colonies in our vicinity will be likely to continue too much disproportioned in strength to be able to give us any dangerous annoyance. Extensive military establishments can not, in this position, be necessary to our security.

It has been said that this proposed increase does not make a large army. For Germany it would not be a large army, for France it would not be a large army, for Russia it would not be a large army; but, gauging it by the necessity which exists in the United States to-day, it is a large regular standing army, and I submit that there is no occasion for it. If it is necessary for us to subdue those who are in arms against the power and the authority of the Government of the United States, we can do it as we did two years ago, and make ample provision for the vindication of the honor and dignity of our country; but, sir, that does not necessarily involve the abandonment of principles which we have adhered to in the past and the turning of our backs upon the principles which we have inherited from the fathers, and adhesion to which has resulted in building up the glory and the honor of our great Republic.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] made an appeal to Senators to permit this bill to pass, and the nature of that appeal was rather an intimation than an accusation that its passage was being unduly obstructed. I desire to say for myself—and I am quite sure I represent the feelings and intentions of others as well as myself—that there has been not the slightest disposition to obstruct the bill. On the contrary, I will say for myself that I have purposely avoided bringing before the Senate a matter in which I feel a very deep interest because of my indisposition to throw any matter into the consideration of the Senate which would delay the action of this body upon the pending bill at the earliest practicable moment.

I desired to say that to the Senator from Connecticut at the time, and it was for that purpose that I attempted to interrupt him; but he exercised his right to decline to be interrupted, and of course I did not press the matter at that time; but I take this opportunity to say that there is no word uttered by me, nor do I believe there is by anybody else, for the purpose of delay. We do think that this is a very important bill and that its provisions should be very thoroughly discussed. I have very little more to say. I do desire to say something in reply to some remarks which have been made this afternoon, somewhat directed toward the positions which I have taken. I understand, however, that it is the desire of Senators on the other side probably to take up the District bill for a short time this afternoon.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. To take up what?

Mr. BACON. I think it is the District bill. So I was told. I may be mistaken about the bill. It is a bill which it will require a good while to read.

Mr. BERRY. Is it the legislative appropriation bill?

Mr. STEWART. The District code.

Mr. BACON. The District code; that is it. Possibly the time might be utilized in that way, and if so I have no disposition to go on now. I shall not occupy much time in the morning. That is a very important matter, I presume, which ought to be taken up at some time, and we are obliged to take some fragmentary time to do it. I wish to accommodate myself to whatever may be the wish of the Senate in the matter.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Will the Senator from Georgia permit me to present an amendment?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I present an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask to have printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. BERRY. I offer an amendment to the pending bill, and ask that it may be read and then printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment presented by the Senator from Arkansas.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert after the last section of the bill the following:

> SEC. —. That within ten days after the bill shall become a law the President of the United States shall issue his proclamation declaring that the United States hereby disclaims any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over the Philippine Islands except for the pacification thereof, and asserts its determination, when that is accomplished, to leave the government and control of the islands to its people.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 10664) granting permission to the Indians on the Grand Portage Indian Reservation, in the State of Minnesota, to cut and dispose of the timber on their several allotments on said reservation was read twice by its title.

Mr. NELSON. There is a similar Senate bill on the Calendar, reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs favorably. I ask that the House bill be substituted for the Senate bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Minnesota, that this bill shall take the place of the Senate bill now on the Calendar? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Senate bill will be indefinitely postponed.

COURTS IN TENNESSEE.

The bill (H. R. 12546) to change and fix the time for holding the district and circuit courts of the United States for the northeastern division of the eastern district of Tennessee was read the first time by its title.

Mr. PETTUS. I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to make a report on that bill, as I have been ordered to do by the Judiciary Committee. This is merely a local bill, changing the time of holding court in the eastern district of Tennessee. The grand jurors are about to be selected, and it merely changes the time of holding that court.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator report upon the same bill?

Mr. PETTUS. Yes, sir; and I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that the bill may be considered now. All that it does is to change the time of holding the court.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the northeastern division of the eastern district of Tennessee, held at Greeneville, Tenn., shall commence on the second Monday in November and May of each year, instead of the fourth Monday in August and February, as is now provided by law; and each of said terms shall continue as long as the presiding judge may deem necessary.

SEC. 2. That no action, suit, proceeding, information, indictment, recognizance, bail bond, or other process in either of said courts shall abate or be rendered invalid by reason of the change of time in the holding of the terms of said courts, but the same shall be deemed to be returnable to, pending, and triable at the terms herein provided for.

SEC. 3. That all laws and parts of laws conflicting with this act be, and are hereby, repealed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4300) to increase the efficiency of the military establishment of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON].

Mr. HAWLEY. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut moves to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. TELLER. Let it be read.

Mr. BACON. I understood that I had the floor. I simply suspended for routine matters.

Mr. HAWLEY. I leave that to the Chair.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Connecticut, under my statement that I have not concluded, desires to move to lay the amendment on the table, I shall not ask him to do otherwise. He can pursue his own course about that.

Mr. HAWLEY. I was not present. I withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut was not present when the Senator from Georgia made his statement. The Senator from Connecticut withdraws his motion?

Mr. HAWLEY. I do for the present.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia if he desires to proceed this evening?

Mr. BACON. I was going to say that I shall not occupy much more of the time of the Senate. I would not occupy any time except that certain things which have been stated especially in reply to what I said to the Senate require that I should do so. I would prefer, if possible, not to go on this afternoon. I have been here on a constant strain since 12 o'clock without going to lunch, and I am fatigued, as is the Senate, I know. It is about 5 o'clock, and I hope the amendment will go over until to-morrow morning.

Mr. ALDRICH. I see no objection to the Senator's amendment going over, provided we can go on with other amendments. I believe there are quite a number of other amendments to be acted upon.

Mr. BACON. I have no objection, of course, to that.

Mr. ALDRICH. I make the request for the personal convenience of the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia being postponed until to-morrow morning? The Chair hears none.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Dolliver,	McComas,	Scott,
Allen,	Elkins,	McCumber,	Sewell,
Allison,	Foraker,	McMillan,	Shoup,
Bacon,	Foster,	Martin,	Simon,
Bard,	Frye,	Money,	Stewart,
Bate,	Gallinger,	Morgan,	Taliaferro,
Berry,	Hale,	Nelson,	Teller,
Burrows,	Hawley,	Perkins,	Thurston,
Caffery,	Heitfeld,	Pettigrew,	Towne,
Carter,	Jones, Ark.	Pettus,	Turley,
Chilton,	Kean,	Platt, Conn.	Warren.
Clark,	Kyle,	Pritchard,
Cockrell,	Lindsay,	Proctor,
Culberson,	Lodge,	Quarles,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In answer to the roll call 53 Senators have responded. There is a quorum present. The Secretary will state the next amendment.

The SECRETARY. Amendment by Mr. TELLER. Amend section 29, page 41, by striking out the words "has been" in line 21 and inserting "shall be hereafter;" so as to read:

SEC. 29. That when in the opinion of the President the interests of the service will be benefited thereby he is empowered to place upon the retired list, by Executive order, any officer who shall be hereafter suspended from duty, either by sentence of court-martial or by virtue of an Executive order in mitigation of such sentence, for a period extending to or within one year of the time of his compulsory retirement for age

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the other day I made some remarks upon the bill which seemed to stir up certain members of the committee who reported it, and I was charged with doing injustice to the War Department. I said that the bill was drawn, in my opinion, with reference to taking care of certain pets of the Department. Now, I am going to add that in my opinion it was also drawn so that it could take care of, and that it was intended to take care of, the late General Eagan, whatever his rank might have been. The section reads as follows:

SEC. 29. That when in the opinion of the President the interests of the service will be benefited thereby, he is empowered to place upon the retired list, by Executive order, any officer who has been suspended from duty, either by sentence of court-martial or by virtue of an Executive order in mitigation of such sentence, for a period extending to or within one year of the time of his compulsory retirement for age.

Now, Mr. President, that has a retroactive effect and allows the President to do what he can not do unless this law passes. I have been told, and I do not suppose there is any secrecy about it, that this provision was put in here that the President might retire General Eagan. The President took another method of retiring him, and, therefore, there is not any particular reason why this section should remain. I have asked the committee to make this provision simply a future rule of conduct, which they are not willing to do. As they are not, I propose to discuss it at some length. My amendment leaves the President with the same power by striking out the words "has been," in line 21, and inserting "shall be hereafter" before the word "suspended."

Mr. President, I need not say to a body of lawyers like this that retroactive laws are vicious, and that, unless there is some very good reason for it, they never ought to be passed. The reasons which seemed to justify the committee have passed away, unless there was a further purpose of retiring an officer who falls within this provision as it now stands, and that is Maj. J. W. Wham, paymaster of the United States Army.

Mr. President, I am quite tempted, although the hour is late, to discuss this provision with reference to the purpose for which it was originally put in, and then to discuss it with reference to the purpose for which it is now maintained and insisted that it shall remain. It can have no other effect whatever now, except as special legislation to retire one single officer, for I do not believe there is now more than one officer who would fall within its provisions. There were undoubtedly two a short time since.

I have not any desire to say anything unpleasant or vicious about anybody nor to criticise the Executive unduly, and if I do so, Mr. President, it is simply because the committee have brought here the most remarkable provision that ever was put in a statute or attempted to be put into a statute since I have been in public life—at least, that attracted my attention.

There was, early in the war with Spain, a great deal of scandal growing out of the use of beef that was usually termed "embalmed" beef. I believe it was beef boiled and canned, and some of it was of very ancient lineage. Some of it had made a trip to Europe and back, had been condemned there and found unfit for use, and was sent back and purchased by the Government of the United States and served out to the volunteer and regular forces of the United States in our Army.

The General of the Army, as it was his duty and his privilege, called the attention of the country to it after his attention had been called to it in a way that he could not avoid it, and an officer of the United States made an exhibition of himself (and I will not attempt to go into the details of it), showing that, while the boast is often made that the Army of the United States is always officered by gentlemen, it was officered to this extent by a miserable blackguard. His language with reference to the Commanding General of the Army was brutal and low, and such as no gentleman would have ever used, no matter what the provocation was.

It was so bad that it could not be overlooked, although there was evidently a very great anxiety to overlook it in the Army; that is, in certain branches of the Army, with certain parties. A proper finding suspended this man, or rather found him guilty of conduct unbecoming an officer, which rendered him unfit to remain in the Army; and the President of the United States furnished the most disgraceful episode that has occurred in the Army since I can remember. The proceeding by the President shocked the moral sense and, I may say, the respect for decency of the American people. The President suspended him on full pay. The President said to him in substance, "You are guilty of conduct unbecoming a gentleman and you may now lie off for four or five years; you need not render any service to the Government, but you shall have your full pay."

Mr. President, that was a decoration and not a suspension, and there are a great many people in the United States who believe it was intended as a decoration, who believe it was a reward for a vile and miserable attack on the General of the Army. This provision was put in the bill here for the purpose of enabling the President to retire General Eagan, so that the President might appoint the man who had been doing the service on half pay, as should have been the case, to the place that would be made vacant by this man's retirement.

I do not want to comment further upon this matter. I know that it was not a very edifying thing to do. I know it was not a very attractive thing for the young men coming into the Army to see a blackguard of this character decorated with permission to retire and to take his ease, while the Government gave him full pay, when other men who have by slight infractions of the regulations and not by the commission of such indecencies as those to which I have referred been suspended without pay or with partial pay. I thought when there was no longer any necessity for it the committee would see the propriety of getting rid of it, but the committee have not done so.

I believe I shall not commit any breach of etiquette or propriety if I say that the provision is maintained in this bill for the purpose of retiring a man who has had a controversy for some time with certain members of the Army. So, if I said the bill was to take care of the pets, I will now add that the bill apparently seems to be for the purpose of getting rid of an offensive Army officer, who can not be gotten rid of under the law, and ought not to be gotten rid of under any circumstances whatever.

Mr. KEAN. What is his position now?

Mr. TELLER. He is suspended.

Mr. KEAN. I thought he was retired.

Mr. TELLER. On July 8, 1898, Congress passed this law:

An act to authorize the President to restore Maj. Joseph W. Wham, paymaster, United States Army, to duty, his former rank, and status in the United States Army.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to revoke the order of the President approving the proceedings of the general court-martial which sentenced Maj. J. W. Wham, paymaster, United States Army, to be dismissed the service, and mitigating the sentence to suspension on half pay from rank, duty, and all privileges until January 18, 1904, his name to be placed at the foot of the lists of majors in the Pay Department, and to disapprove the sentence of dismissal of Maj. Joseph W. Wham, paymaster, United States Army, and to restore him to duty, previous rank, and status in the United States Army, and full pay from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. President, that act passed both branches of Congress and became a law. Major Wham has not been reinstated. I will admit that this act does not compel the President of the United States to reinstate him, but I believe this act passed practically with the unanimous approval of both branches of Congress.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator permit me one word, as I happen to be familiar with the case?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRELL. The act referred to left it entirely in the discretion of the President to do just as he saw proper.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator had been listening to what I said, he would have noted that I said the same thing. I did not claim that the President was obliged to put Major Wham in the Army, but I do claim that the passage of that law was a moral reversal of the sentence of the court-martial; and I do claim that after putting this man Eagan in a place it is an indecent thing for Congress to pass a law by which Major Wham may be deprived of what we have declared he is entitled to.

I know the President of the United States does not necessarily have to put this gentleman back in the Army, but I know why he does not put him back, and that is because certain Army officers get the ear of the President. I understand the President never said he would not put him back, but he has simply not put him back. I want to leave him where he is, if I can not do any better. I should like to see him put back, and I believe those who have examined into the matter would like to see that done.

Mr. KEAN. Why would not the Senator do the same with General Eagan?

Mr. TELLER. Because Major Wham did not commit any such crime as Eagan did, and there is nothing in the record which shows that he is the same character of man as the record shows the other to be—a record that he never could dispute, a record that nothing could set aside—his own vile language, his lack of propriety, his lack of decency, and his lack of the first principles of gentility; and yet he is retired on three-quarters pay.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. What did Major Wham do?

Mr. TELLER. I have got the report here which shows, but I do not want to try Wham's case here. What I insist upon—and I insist that this is an elementary principle of justice and decency—is that this body has no right, without a full knowledge of all the facts, to come in here and interfere with this thing now after it has pronounced its judgment that this man was improperly treated, that justice required that he should be reinstated, and after the committee of the House of Representatives and a committee of this body reported in his favor and Congress passed the bill.

It can not be said that Congress did not understand the matter. After Congress passed that bill two years ago, I say it is not the right thing for the pending bill to contain a provision, when only a few men know what is intended by it, to do so serious a thing as that. That is why I have asked to strike out the provision or to amend it so that it shall have no retroactive effect.

Mr. President, I said that I did not want to try this man's case here. I do not want to try it. It is not the right thing to try such a case here, and it would take a longer time than ought to be consumed during the consideration of this bill.

I have here the report of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives, made February 10, 1898:

Mr. McDonald, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4237) to enable the President to restore Maj. Joseph W. Wham, paymaster, United States Army, to duty, his former rank and status in the United States Army, submit the following report:

Maj. Joseph W. Wham, paymaster, United States Army, was court-martialed and dismissed the service, but was unanimously recommended for clemency by the court. The President commuted the sentence to suspension on half pay until 1904, date of retirement. The facts, culled from the voluminous record, are as follows:

Nearly seventeen years ago Maj. Joseph W. Wham, paymaster, United States Army, was president, and D. C. Holcomb general manager, of a mining company, in which Major Wham had invested $17,000. The company needed funds to meet an indebtedness to one Atchinson. President Wham and General Manager Holcomb joined in their personal note to the Laramie National Bank for $1,000, obtained that amount, and paid it to Atchinson in liquidation of the mining company's debt.

At about the time of the maturity of this note Holcomb, in his unsupported and contradictory deposition, claims that he sent the money to meet this note to Hon. Otto Gramm, State treasurer of Wyoming, and also treasurer of the mining company, to deliver to President Wham. Gramm squarely contradicts Holcomb as to this, and testifies that no such transaction occurred. Hon. M. C. Jahren, secretary of the company and city attorney at Laramie, Wyo., also testifies in denial of the assertion of Holcomb that he sent the $1,000 or any sum to the treasurer for such purpose, or for any purpose, at any time, and that it would have been impossible for such a transaction to occur and the books of the company not show it.

Both Treasurer Gramm and Secretary Jahren testify that neither said $1,000 nor any sum was ever paid to Major Wham, and that Major Wham is not now and never was indebted to said company in that or any other sum. Both these officers of the company squarely deny in their testimony that any such sum was ever paid as stated, and President Wham also testifies that he never received any such sum or any sum at any time or any place. Holcomb's claim, which was not made for nearly ten years after the alleged transaction, is therefore unsupported except by his own contradictory deposition, and opposed to this are the denials of State Treasurer Gramm, Hon. M. C. Jahren, secretary of the company, and President Wham, all of whom are corroborated by the books of the company.

Holcomb asserts that he has lost certain letters from Treasurer Gramm and President Wham, which would show that they received the $1,000, as he claims. Holcomb's testimony upon this point, that he sent this money from Peoria, Ill., to Gramm, at Laramie, Wyo., having been definitely and squarely denied by the treasurer, the secretary, and the president of the mining company, and verified by the books, could easily have been corroborated, if it were true, by producing the books of the express company, the express company's receipt, or the receipt for the registered letter, or the stub of the check, or the check itself, which would necessarily bear Major Wham's indorsement.

Mind you, none of these things were presented.

The complaint on which the judgment was rendered in the civil suit set up that the claim on which the judgment was based was an accommodation note which Holcomb had had to pay for Major Wham, whereas Holcomb, in his unsupported and contradictory deposition, claims that it was for $1,000 of corporate money. It is hardly necessary to add that any court of justice on appeal would have reversed this judgment.

The case had been pending for a long time, and at last hurried to trial, when Major Wham was at Tucson, Ariz., almost across the continent. Major Wham, according to his own testimony, received no notification whatever of the date of trial of the civil suit in New York. But granting that the claim of the prosecution is true, i. e., that a telegram was sent two days prior to trial, when it required five days to get to New York, thus leaving Major Wham three days less time than was absolutely necessary in which to reach that city. Major Wham could therefore not be present, and made no defense—

Remember that Major Wham says he did not know there was any trial going on—owing to a controversy with his attorney relative to the attorney's demand for the payment of what Major Wham deemed an exorbitant bill, rendered before trial, for nearly 60 per cent of the amount involved.

The report clearly shows that if the complainant, Holcomb, had caused execution to issue and proper civil effort to be made, instead of delaying for months and then asking the War Department to enforce the payment of a questionable civil claim, he could easily have enforced payment. The judgment was obtained in June, 1890. Had he levied upon Major Wham's property at any time during that year, he could have secured his money. It is in evidence, and not rebutted or denied, that from 1890 to February, 1891, when the Arizona floods wiped out Major Wham's property, there was plenty of available assets upon which to make this judgment; after which, by the act of Providence, the property of Major Wham was swept away and he was left with nothing but his Army pay, nearly 90 per cent of which went to creditors.

Finally, to pile Pelion on Ossa. Put on one end of the scales of justice the complainant's wholly unsupported and contradictory testimony, and on the other the testimony of Hon. Otto Gramm, State treasurer of Wyoming and lessee of the Laramie rolling mills, a most reliable and responsible business man, and the testimony of Hon. M. C. Jahren, city attorney of Laramie, Wyo., and Major Wham, who had correctly accounted for millions of public funds. Now, add to this the abrogation on both trials of the rule of law requiring a fact to be proven by the best evidence, which, in this case, is the express receipt or record, registered receipt or letter, or check, which would necessarily bear Major Wham's indorsement, and we are unable to see how any earthly power could make Major Wham's vindication clearer. It certainly has been axiomatically proven if not demonstrated that Major Wham did not owe this money.

Major Whan was suspended because he did not pay this debt.

That this fearful injustice to a gallant soldier of the great Republic may be speedily corrected and a great wrong righted, the committee concur in the recommendation of the Secretary of War for the passage of the bill. The Secretary's report, hereto attached, after stating that he had "devoted considerable time to the consideration of the case," concludes as follows:

"It is true that the unexpired portion of the sentence could be remitted by the President and he could be restored to duty, but, in my opinion, this would not be a full measure of relief to him, and I therefore recommend legislation for his relief."

The Secretary of War in his report also says that Major Wham's "record during the war was a brilliant one," and, judging from the following testimonials, his record as a paymaster has been no less brilliant:

"Major Wham, while serving under me in the Department of the Atlantic, performed his duties in a courteous and satisfactory manner, promptly and most excellently. There were none better.

"Very truly, yours,

"DANIEL McCLURE,
"Colonel, Retired."

"During the period of Major Wham's service under my command in the Department of Arizona he performed his duties in a prompt, courteous, and saisfactory manner.

"ALEXANDER McDOWELL McCOOK,
"Major-General, Retired."

"Major Wham, paymaster, United States Army, while stationed at my headquarters in 1892, attended promptly, courteously, and satisfactorily to his duties.

"W. P. CARLIN,
"Brigadier-General and Brevet Major-General, U. S. A., Retired."

Brig. Gen. E. S. Otis, now commanding Department of Colorado, and the last department commander under whom Major Wham served, at the conclusion of an extended letter, says: "His (Major Wham's) services were discharged promptly and satisfactorily."

Attached is a recommendation for the Congressional medal of honor on two distinct occasions, by Major-General Kimball, Major Wham's division commander during the war, and by Maj. Gen. D. S. Stanley, United States Army, for bounding over the works at Franklin and going to the rescue of a fallen comrade, and a few days later at Nashville, Tenn., planting the colors of Grant's old regiment first on Montgomery Hill, the apex of the Confederate position; also a recommendation for promotion to Paymaster-General, signed by the entire Illinois delegation, irrespective of party, and C. T. Christiansen, manager Drexel, Morgan & Co.; Rev. William Hays Ward, editor of the Iudependent, and Gen. Horace Porter.

Mr. President, if this was the place for the trial of this matter all these proofs could be brought up, but there is no reason on the face of the earth why Major Wham should be put on trial here, and there is no reason under the sun which can be given why there should be any attempt here to legislate him out of the present condition in which he stands, which is unfortunate enough, God knows, for a brave and generous soldier.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, January 19, 1898.

SIR: I have the honor to return H. R. 4237—

That is the bill which became a law—

"To enable the President to restore Maj. Joseph W. Wham, paymaster United States Army, to duty, his former rank and status in the United States Army."

Major Wham was tried by general court-martial and sentenced to be dismissed the service, which sentence was mitigated by the President to suspension on half pay from rank, duty, and all privileges until January 18, 1904, his name to be placed at the foot of majors in the Pay Department. I inclose a copy of the report of the Judge-Advocate-General made to me on the 26th of August, 1897, in which he reviews the proceedings in the case.

The charge against Major Wham, upon which he was tried, grew out of a transaction in relation to a mining company which involved the payment of a note amounting to $1,000. It was entirely a private transaction between individuals, and had no relation to any matters connected with the military service, except as it affected his conduct as an officer of the Army.

I have devoted considerable time to the consideration of this case, and am not convinced from the testimony that Major Wham was so culpable as to warrant his dismissal from the service or even his punishment in the degree to which it was mitigated by the President. He was careless and negligent of his own interests in not submitting a defense to the charge against him, the case going to a verdict upon the testimony of the prosecution.

We know from Major Wham's statement—and there is no proof that is worthy of any consideration to the contrary—that this officer did not know that the case was to be tried until after judgment had been rendered.

Mr. SPOONER. Where was the case tried?

Mr. TELLER. In New York.

Mr. SPOONER. Was he represented by counsel?

Mr. TELLER. He must have been, or else there would not have been any judgment to the contrary. He had an attorney with whom he had a quarrel, and the attorney did not attend to the case. That is the fact about it, as I understand.

From papers filed by Major Wham it appears that he lost considerable money in ventures in which he engaged, especially as to two ranches which he attempted to make productive or profitable, and was without means to meet his indebtedness. His record in the Army during the war was a brilliant one.

It is true that the unexpired portion of the sentence could be remitted by the President and he could be restored to duty; but, in my opinion, this would not be a full measure of relief to him, and I therefore recommend legislation for his relief.

Very respectfully,

R. A. ALGER,
Secretary of War.

That is addressed to the Hon. JOHN A. T. HULL, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives, and it is the report of that committee, which was a unanimous report, that I am reading.

Mr. President, this section, if it is allowed, will enable the influences at the Department that are opposed to the Major and hostile to him to put another indignity upon him, which he does not want and which his friends do not want. I did not expect that this matter was to come up. The junior Senator from Illinois had it in charge and not myself, and he is specially interested in it. When I get through I am going to ask that this go over until to-morrow. I did not ask that before because I did not want to delay.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Will the Senator yield to a motion to adjourn?

Mr. TELLER. I will, of course.

Mr. PROCTOR. Let the Senator from Colorado finish.

Mr. TELLER. Or I will finish the reading of this, but I do not want it acted upon and I do not intend that it shall be acted upon to-night. Now I wish to read a letter from Nathan Kimball:

OGDEN, UTAH, October 24, 1893.

SIR: I had the honor to command the First Division, Fourth Army Corps, Army of the Cumberland, at the battle of Nashville, on the 15th and 16th days of December, 1864, and in the capture of Montgomery Hill on the 15th, containing 12 Napoleon guns—the apex of the rebel position. The Twenty-first Illinois Veteran Volunteer Infantry was in the rear line of battle when the charge was ordered.

That it was in the front line when the hill was captured; that during the charge the color-bearer of that regiment was severely wounded, and that Sergt. J. W. Wham took the colors, carried them forward, and planted them upon the works; if not absolutely the first to be planted, they were certainly very nearly so. And I earnestly recommend that for this gallant act he be awarded the Congressional medal of honor.

Very respectfully,

NATHAN KIMBALL,
Late Brigadier and Brevet Major-General,
Commanding First Division, Fourth Corps, Army of the Cumberland.

Hon. SECRETARY OF WAR,
Washington, D. C.

Here is another by the same officer:

OGDEN, UTAH, October 24, 1893.

SIR: I had the honor to command the First Division, Fourth Army Corps, Army of the Cumberland, in the battle at Franklin, Tenn., on the 30th day of November, 1864. The Twenty-first Regiment Illinois Veteran Volunteer Infantry was in my division and took a prominent part in that battle. The regiment was noted for its daring gallantry.

My attention is called to the daring and gallant act of Sergt. Joseph W. Wham, afterwards first lieutenant of Company G, Twenty-first Illinois Infantry, who, at the risk of his own life and in the face of a close and direct fire from the enemy at short range, jumped over the breastworks to the rescue of his comrade, James Hillham, who had been shot and fell outside of our lines. Sergeant Wham lifted him up and carried him inside of our lines.

For this daring and successful act in going to his comrade's rescue I with pleasure do earnestly commend him to the favorable consideration of the Secretary of War, and recommend that a medal of honor be granted him.

Very respectfully,

NATHAN KIMBALL,
Late Brigadier and Brevet Major-General,
Commanding First Division, Fourth Corps, Army of the Cumberland.

The SECRETARY OF WAR,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. May I ask the Senator from Colorado a question?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I understood him to say that the sentence of the court-martial was that Major Wham should be suspended, until the time of his retirement, on half pay.

Mr. PROCTOR. He was sentenced to be dismissed.

Mr. TELLER. But the court unanimously recommended him to the mercy of the President. Then the President mitigated it in that way.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. If the President should retire him he would get three-fourths pay.

Mr. TELLER. He does not care whether he gets three-fourths pay or full pay. He feels that there has been an injustice done him, and so do his friends. It is not a question with Major Wham of dollars and cents. He is not putting his character and his honor up for sale in that way. All he wants is that he shall be let alone; and if the President of the United States does not see fit to reinstate him, he wants to stand upon this record that he made here. He does not believe, nor do I believe, nor do any of his friends believe, that that indignity ought to be put upon him, as we believe it would be if this bill passes. Otherwise this particular provision of the bill would not be insisted upon as it is being insisted upon.

GOVERNOR'S OFFICE, UNITED STATES SOLDIERS' HOME.
Washington, D. C., November 1, 1893.

I certify that I know Capt. Harrison Black, and also know Capt. James W. Duncan, late of Twenty-first Illinois Volunteers, and that I am intimately acquainted with Nathan Kimball, late brigadier-general, brevet major-general of volunteers, and I have the fullest confidence in their statements of the bravery and gallantry of Sergeant Wham, now Major Wham, at the battles of Franklin and Nashville, and I do hereby recommend him for the medal of honor.

D. K. STANLEY,
Brigadier-General and Brevet Major-General, U. S. A.

I wish to say that if the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] were here he would relieve me of any of this duty, and probably the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON] would also, although I might have said something in defense of the Major on my own behalf, because I have a very strong feeling that he has been badly treated and is being badly treated, and is liable to continue to be badly treated.

I am not going to read all of what follows, but here is a petition from people in Illinois. It is signed by a large number of members of Congress and members of the legislature and State officials to the extent, I should say, of thirty or forty. I wish to read what it says. I will not undertake to read the names, but I will say that there are the names of a great many members of Congress whom I have known. Some of them are still in the public service and some of them are out. HOPKINS is here, CANNON is here, MASON was a member and is now a Senator, CULLOM is in this body. They signed this petition:

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., January —, 1890.

To the PRESIDENT:

We most earnestly ask the appointment of Maj. J. W. Wham, paymaster, U. S. A., as Paymaster-General of the Army. He was a soldier in Grant's old regiment, and participated with that regiment in thirteen battles.

Years after, when the young and stalwart soldier had reached mature manhood, and had been intrusted with many responsibilities by his old colonel, who, meantime, had won the highest honor of earth (President of the great Republic), was, finally, March 3, 1877, honored by him with the appointment of paymaster, which was probably the last official act of the great commander's illustrious career.

Immediately after the battle of Stone River a Department order was issued requiring five privates to be selected "who were most distinguished for bravery, enterprise, endurance, soldierly conduct, and skill in the use of arms." Private Wham was one of the men selected. At Franklin he bounded over the works and, amidst the most terrible battle of modern times, went to the assistance of a fallen comrade. At Nashville, a few days later, in the charge on Montgomery Hill, his regiment started in the rear line of battle, swept to the front, and its colors were the first planted on the apex of the rebel position, placed by him, though not of the color guard; and recently among the lonely mountains of Arizona when attacked by banditti he defended his trust until his little escort had sustained the heaviest casualty list ever historically reported, every soldier but one who remained with him in the vicinity of the treasure box being wounded.

I desire to say that some of his enemies around the War Department have attempted to make it appear that in this action this man, who rendered such service in the war, showed the white feather; but it is not true.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to say a word?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I was chairman of the Committee on Claims when the bill was introduced to reimburse Major Wham for the money he lost on that occasion. He was overwhelmed. I gave the whole transaction very careful investigation and reported in favor of the bill, and it passed both Houses of Congress.

Mr. TELLER. Did the Senator find anything discreditable?

Mr. SPOONER. On the contrary, we found that he did everything that could be expected of a brave man having in charge funds of the Government.

Mr. TELLER. I am very glad the Senator has said that, because it saves my taking up that phase of the case. The case was examined by the proper committee, and it was found that he was not to blame, and, as was said, we paid the money. I will not waste any time on that point.

It was such yeoman service as this which kept our flag in the air and our nation on the map of the world.

There can be no just comparison of such service with that rendered in the safe and comfortable seclusion of an office located far from the sound of battle.

Every cent of the vast amount intrusted to him for disbursement has been properly accounted for.

That is signed by the adjutant-general of Illinois, captains, colonels, members of the House, members of the Senate, or those who are now members; and I think that makes a case. I will say nothing more until I have heard from the committee. If the committee have any defense for this proceeding I want to hear it.

Mr. PROCTOR. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CARTER. I trust the Senator will withhold that motion for a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont withhold his motion?

Mr. PROCTOR. I do.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, it is manifest that this bill, with all pending amendments, can be now disposed of within some reasonable time. The debate has gone along from day to day with considerable indulgence and with very little method. It does not appear that any Senator desires to address himself formally to the provisions of the bill. Some criticisms are being made from time to time with reference to certain provisions and amendments proposed, but I do not know of any Senator who is preparing a speech which he desires to deliver at some future time. I think it must be obvious to all Senators that it is the duty of this body to dispose of the bill at the earliest practical date.

We have, I think, in the Pacific eight well-fitted transports for troops. Those transports, if started at an early date in the work of transporting to the Philippines the troops which we hope to have raised under the bill, according to its provisions, and then in bringing back volunteers, may, without the employment of special transports under contract, complete the work of substituting new recruits for our army in the Philippines before the 1st of July. If, on the other hand, we delay the passage of this bill, it is quite probable that we will be compelled, in order to have substitutes for the volunteers and regulars entitled to discharge on the 1st of July, to employ special transports.

It is not in the per diem allowed for the special transports that so much expense will be incurred, although each transport usually costs a large sum per day, but in the fitting up of the transports to carry the men and their provisions great expense will be incurred. I do not believe it is overstating the mark to say that each day's delay in the passage of the pending bill will involve an additional expense upon the Government of at least $500,000.

Mr. COCKRELL. That would have a great deal of influence if said right at the beginning of the session of the Senate, when everybody could hear it, but when only a few are here I am afraid it will not have its weight.

Mr. CARTER. I trust it will have its weight with those who are here, although the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri is very pertinent, there being but a few Senators present. My idea was at this time to ask unanimous consent for the fixing of an hour or a day when a vote shall be taken.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut (to Mr. CARTER). Ask it to-morrow morning.

Mr. CARTER. But in view of the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri, I will defer making the request until to-morrow morning.

Mr. TELLER. I want to say a word about fixing a time. I will not agree, so far as I am concerned, to fixing a time. If the Senator wants to meet here at 11 o'clock or 10 o'clock, or to stay at night, I will be with him; I will not make any fuss.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Let us adjourn until 11 o'clock.

Mr. TELLER. I do not care what you do about that.

Mr. ALDRICH. Let us adjourn till 11.

Mr. TELLER. I am opposed, on a bill of this kind, to putting the time for voting down to a day certain. If this is a pressing case, let the party that controls the Senate fix the time for the debate and let the debate go on.

Mr. CARTER. If the Senator desires to put it upon a purely partisan basis, the party in the Senate is in charge of the Senator from Colorado if he desires to obstruct the passage of the bill.

Mr. TELLER. That is a gratuitous insult on the part of the Senator. He knows I do not intend to obstruct this bill.

Mr. CARTER. I merely suggested that the Senator's remark——

Mr. TELLER. I said I am willing to come here.

Mr. CARTER. I merely suggested that the Senator's remark as to its being a party measure ought not to have been made.

Mr. TELLER. It is a party measure, Mr. President.

Mr. CARTER. It is a national measure, Mr. President.

Mr. SCOTT. It is a patriotic measure.

Mr. CARTER. It is reported here by the unanimous report of a committee composed of members of both political parties.

Mr. TELLER. I do not care how it is reported.

Mr. CARTER. I care how it is reported. It is the best effort that could be made upon a scientific basis to present a bill for the reorganization of the Army of the United States; and if the Senator from Colorado desires to make of this bill a partisan measure pure and simple, and to discuss it from that basis, he will, I think, have difficulty in getting a following in this Chamber.

Mr. TELLER. I have not discussed it for a single moment from a partisan standpoint; but if the party in power here feel that this is so urgent, then let them change the hour of our meeting. That is all I said. I will not retort to the Senator from Montana——

Mr. CARTER. There is nothing to retort to.

Mr. TELLER. I will simply say that I have spent not a minute, nor has anybody else on our side who is opposed to the bill, on the reorganization. We have yielded that. What we have been complaining about and what we object to is the great Army that you are creating. I have said nothing about the reorganization. The two things are different, and because this is a good bill for reorganization the Senator is not going to close my mouth. He is not going to frighten me by saying it will cost $500,000 a day or $5,000,000 or any other sum.

If we adopt this policy, it will cost millions and millions when I am dead and gone, and when he is, and our children and grandchildren are dead and gone. I propose to debate it not from a political standpoint, as the Senator says, and my reference to partisanship was simply that his party have the power, they can fix the time, and if they think there is unnecessary delay, which they have no right to say, because there has not been. To-day your side has taken as much time as the other side, surely. They may fix the time to come here at 9 o'clock in the morning, if they want to, for all I care.

Mr. CARTER. In conformity with the suggestion of the Senator, I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to lay before the Senate certain bills from the House. Will the Senator from South Dakota withdraw his motion?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I withdraw it for that purpose.

AUGUSTUS R. ROLLINS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3642) restoring the pension of Augustus R. Rollins, alias Rhenault A. Rollins, which was to amend the title so as to read "An act granting a pension to Augustus R. Rollins, alias Rhenault A. Rollins."

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

SAMUEL DORNON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3342) granting a pension to Samuel Dornon, which was in line 8, to strike out all after "month" down to and including "receiving" in line 9.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

ELIZA L. REESE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2729) granting a pension to Eliza L. Reese.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate nonconcur in the amendment and request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. SHOUP, and Mr. TALIAFERRO were appointed.

JAMES A. THOMAS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2432) granting an increase of pension to James A. Thomas.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate nonconcur in the amendment and request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. SHOUP, and Mr. TALIAFERRO were appointed.

AMERICUS V. RICE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3890) granting an increase of pension to Americus V. Rice.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate nonconcur in the amendment and request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. QUARLES, and Mr. KENNEY were appointed.

GEORGE G. KEMP.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions:

To the Senate of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 8th instant (the House of Representatives concurring), I return herewith the bill of the Senate No. 1226, entitled "An act granting an increase of pension to George G. Kemp."

WILLIAM McKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 14, 1901.

Mr. PROCTOR. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Vermont, that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 15, 1901, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 14, 1901.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday's proceedings was read and approved.

REPRINT OF PUBLIC ACTS.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that there be a reprint of public act No. 185 and public act No. 4—5,000 copies.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read these two numbers by their titles, so the House may know what it is.

The Clerk read as follows:

Public No. 184 (July 6, 1900), an act to ratify an agreement with the Indians of the Fort Hall Reservation, in Idaho, and making appropriations to carry the same into effect.

Public No. 4 (January 4, 1901), an act making appropriation to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the order is accordingly made.

REPORT OF POSTAL COMMISSION.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present to the House the report of the Joint Postal Commission appointed under act of June 30, 1898, to investigate the question of railway mail pay and the postal service generally. I ask that the same be printed; and further ask unanimous consent that Senator CHANDLER, who is absent, may be permitted to file his views within twenty days, if he so desire.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would ask the gentleman from California if a bill accompanies the report?

Mr. LOUD. There is no bill, Mr. Speaker, accompanying the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California submits the report of what is known as the Postal Commission, and asks that it be printed, and that Senator CHANDLER have twenty days to file his views. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the river and harbor bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the river and harbor bill.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to withhold that motion for a moment, until I can make some arrangement for District business, this being District day.

Mr. BURTON. I yield to the gentleman's request.

Mr. BABCOCK. The District Committee, Mr. Speaker, does not desire to interfere with the appropriations or the business of the House, and would ask that it may be in order to call up District business next Monday, subject to any matters that may come up under suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, the gentleman from Wisconsin, chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, asks unanimous consent, this being District of Columbia day, that a week from to-day be set apart for the consideration of matters from the District Committee, subject to matters called up under suspension of the rules. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is made. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole.

The motion was agreed to.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. HOPKINS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, pursuant to the direction of the House, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13189) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Chairman, I protest against appropriations for great national projects which will confer great national benefits being charged to the account of individual States. During the debate upon the pending bill attention has been called to the large appropriations which will go to certain States. It has been said that Massachusetts will receive a large sum by the provisions of this bill. I wish to say that a very large proportion of the amount appropriated for Massachusetts items is for the improvement of Boston Harbor. Does anyone contend that Massachusetts is to be benefited exclusively from such an expenditure? Less than 10 per cent of the cargoes carried from Boston Harbor by our great steamers consists of local shipments from the city of Boston. More than 90 per cent comes from the West and the South. This proposed improvement will aid the producers of the whole country and be a national benefit. It is largely the great increase of our export trade which has brought prosperity to our people and happiness to our homes. We want to increase our export trade. If we are to control the markets of the world we should make every effort to put our goods into those markets at the lowest possible price. Therefore diminution of the cost of transportation becomes a factor of great importance. It is the increase in the size of our steamers which has brought about a decrease in the cost of transportation, and it is because of such increase in size that our harbors must be provided with wider and deeper channels.

Twenty-five years ago steamers sailing from our Atlantic ports were of 2,500 tons weight, from 300 to 400 feet long, and drew from 18 to 20 feet of water. Then the rates of freight were from 16 to 20 cents a bushel for grain and other freight in that proportion.

Ten years passed by and the steamers were of double the size, with a capacity of 5,000 tons weight. Rates of freight were reduced 50 per cent. Instead of 16 to 20 cents a bushel for grain, the rate was from 8 to 10 cents. To-day there are steamers of over 10,000 tons weight, over 600 feet long, and drawing 32 feet of water. As a direct consequence, freight rates were again reduced and are to-day one-quarter of the rate which existed in 1875, so that grain can be shipped to Liverpool at 5 cents per bushel. The producers of cotton in the South pay from 50 cents to $1 per bale instead of from two and one-half to three dollars. The cost of transportation for cattle, provisions, and all kinds of freight has been decreased in proportion. If we have a great surplus of grain, the prices we get for the surplus fixes the price for the whole crop. It needs little argument to show that it is the producer who gets the benefit of a decrease in the cost of transportation. It is in the interest of the whole people that Boston be made a port of the first class. It is 180 miles nearer Liverpool than any of the ports of the South. There are no terminal charges, and freight is taken from the car to the ships as cheaply as it can be done anywhere.

It can not be truthfully said that partiality has been shown to the port of Boston. Since 1825 about $4,000,000 has been appropriated by the General Government, while the State itself has expended nearly $3,000,000 in supplementing that work. The last river and harbor bill carried an authorization of $7,000,000 for New York. Six or seven millions have been expended at Philadelphia, over five millions at Savannah, and over eight millions at Galveston. I do not mention these appropriations because we begrudge them. They were made to aid in the development of the commerce of the whole country, and Massachusetts has shared in the benefit. More than $40,000,000 have been expended upon the Great Lakes. Who can overestimate the benefit the people of this country have received in dollars and cents. The appropriations in the pending bill for the West Nebish Channel and the Detroit River, for the harbors at Cleveland and Buffalo, should not be charged to the account of any locality. Part of those appropriations should be charged to Massachusetts. It is for our advantage that the marvelous tide of commerce now sweeping across the Great Lakes should grow greater and greater, and it is for the interests of that region that Boston should be supplied with the channel facilities of a harbor of the first class.

The amount of this appropriation is not large when the importance of this port is considered and the volume of business transacted. The tonnage is large, and the imports and exports for the year ending June 30, 1900, amounted to $184,500,000, and the amount of revenue collected in that year was $18,871,848. The present depth of the channel in Boston Harbor is but 27 feet. As the steamers are steadily increasing in size and draft, a depth of 35 feet is necessary to afford safe ingress and egress. The resolution in the emergency river and harbor act called for channels 2,000 feet wide. The project has been modified so that the width in the outer harbor shall be 1,500 feet and in the inner harbor only 1,200 feet. This was done because of the great increase in cost caused by the underlying ledges which occur irregularly all over the harbor. Such channels are not as wide as was wished, but it is believed they will make Boston Harbor a port of the first class and enable it to take rank with the great seaports of the world. I ask the House to vote for the appropriation recommended by the committee because it is just and right.

And now a word about some of the other Massachusetts items. There is an appropriation of $200,000 for the harbor of refuge at Sandy Bay, situated at the extremity of Cape Ann, which has been called the Hatteras of the New England coast. Surely it can not be said that this project is for the exclusive benefit of Massachusetts. Seventy thousand boats passed that point in a single year. You remember the ill-fated Portland. She went down with every soul on board. The keeper at Thatcher Island light saw the Portland off Cape Ann that dreadful night. She could have been saved with the 200 people on board had this harbor been completed. Well do the engineers in their report speak of it as a great national harbor of refuge. There is an appropriation of $150,000 for the harbor at Fall River. Fall River is the largest cotton manufacturing city of the United States. The commerce amounts to over $130,000,000 a year. It certainly is wise legislation and in the interest of all the people to aid the development of so great a commerce. One other appropriation I will mention, that for Gloucester. The Government has started the construction of a breakwater, to complete which would have taken about $600,000. We have authorized the completion of a modified project, at a cost of $302,000. It was necessary that this should be done. Thirty-one boats have been wrecked upon that submerged breakwater. In its present condition it is a constant menace to human life and to property. The committee could do nothing else but order its completion. The other Massachusetts items were carefully considered by the committee. If there is one which can not stand the test of merit, let it go out of the bill. I do not fear the closest scrutiny. I invite it.

The Committee on Rivers and Harbors has striven earnestly and tirelessly to construct a bill which would be fair to all sections and aid in the development of the commerce of the whole country. In our committee room political lines have not been drawn. Sectionalism has had no part. I know Massachusetts would have been treated fairly if the consideration of its items had been left to the Southern Democrats, who represent the minority upon the committee. General CATCHINGS, of Mississippi, who was for two terms its chairman, has made a reputation for fairness. His retirement from Congress is a loss, not alone to his section, but to New England. It has been said that large appropriations go to Ohio. If so, it is because such appropriations are proper and right. I believe with perfect sincerity that the chairman of this committee would turn down a project without merit from his own State more quickly than one from any other part of the country. He has the confidence of his committee for the very reason that he has the confidence of the House, because he is able, because he is patient and thorough and honest and fair. The committee's task was not an easy one. The engineers have recommended projects which call for expenditures of $400,000,000. This bill provides for an expenditure of $60,000,000. The committee has done the best it could. It has tried to be fair. I believe its bill will be indorsed by the House and receive the approval of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] is recognized for ten minutes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to discuss the general features of this bill. On one of the days of this debate, during the progress of the speech of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN], I thought certain language of his could be interpreted to convey a meaning which I felt sure at the time he did not mean to convey, and observing, as I thought, that he was entirely master of the questions that he was debating, I sought to call his attention to what I believed to be a misunderstanding in order that he might correct himself if I was right, for I could not believe that he intended to make the statement which I understood him to make. I have had furnished to me by the official reporter the language of the gentleman to which I refer, and which I will have placed in the RECORD with my present remarks:

Now, I wish to call attention to one or two items of appropriation that have been made on the Columbia River. In the first place, there has been expended between the city of Portland and the Columbia River $160,000 at one time, $155,000 at another time, $190,000 at another time, and the present bill increases the amount to about $850,000. Now, the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army makes some statements regarding the expenditures at the mouth of the Columbia River. In the first place, the former appropriations for the mouth of the Columbia River have been about $2,225,000. When they started in spending money on the mouth of the Columbia River they had 31 feet of water. After they had spent three-quarters of a million of dollars they took another sounding and they then had 28 feet of water. Then they spent three-quarters of a million more, and now they have 24 feet of water. The question now resolves itself into one of arithmetical proportion. If we have spent over $5,000,000 between the city of Portland and the sea to produce a deep channel and we have 7 feet less water now than we had when we started, how much water shall we have when we have spent $5,000,000 more?

Now, all over this State of Oregon you will find appropriations made. Gentlemen have said that they must be guided to a certain extent by the recommendations made by the Chief of Engineers. I make the statement on the floor of this House that in one locality in the State of Oregon they got 140 per cent of what was recommended. [Laughter.] I am perfectly willing to have anybody deny that statement if it is not true.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. I understand there was a project which was recommended by a former Congress and an appropriation provided for it which would have made possible the navigation of the Snake and the Upper Columbia, thereby giving the people of Idaho and Washington and the adjacent States some benefit from the great appropriations that have been made at the mouth of the river. What did the committee do with that project?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Ah, exactly; that is the very proposition that I have been talking about, which is the amendment that we have been trying to get for twenty-five years at The Dalles. Up to the present time all this money has been expended between Portland and the sea and benefits Portland only, because the river above Portland is absolutely impassable. They have spent $5,400,000 at the present time down here, which makes $5½ for every man, woman, and baby in the city of Portland, Oreg., and the only commerce that benefits is the commerce directly between Portland and the sea. The people who reside up here [referring to the map] have to ship their grain by rail down to Portland. The railroad companies charge them as much, or practically as much, for transporting it from eastern Washington to Portland or the Columbia River as they do for transporting it from this point 2,000 miles east to the city of Chicago. It has been the dream of the farmers of that region for forty years to be permitted to load their wheat on barges in the Columbia River and take it down to market the cheapest way to carry their products to market, and every time any man has gone over into that country he has promised that the next Congress was going to make an appropriation for the Columbia River, but when we come on the floor of the House the chairman of the committee says it sounds like one of the dreams of Jules Verne.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman from Washington will allow me——

Mr. CUSHMAN. With very great pleasure.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman will go a little further back in the record of the appropriations by Congress, I think he will modify his statement in regard to the failure of the appropriations for the Columbia River above the city of Portland; or, in other words, not above the city of Portland, which is not on the Columbia River, but on the Willamette River. And, furthermore, I think the gentleman will find quite large appropriations made on the Willamette River to promote the navigation up into the very valley about which the gentleman has been talking, as high up, perhaps, as Salem, in the State of Oregon. Furthermore, the gentleman will find large appropriations which were expended, with what result I can not state.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Now, I would advise you to print that speech in the RECORD.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, my friend, I am only trying to suggest to you—I have some pride in the former history of this committee.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Well, I have some pride in this speech, and you are destroying it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. You will find very large appropriations for The Dalles. I guess they did not do any good, but they were expended there—very large appropriations.

Mr. CUSHMAN. The Chair has advised me that I have only two or three minutes yet remaining. I think I can conclude in a very few minutes.

The portion of the gentleman's speech to which I desired to call his attention at the time, in a spirit of pure friendship and with a view that he might restate his direct purpose in some of the language which he used, is the following:

> Up to the present time all this money has been expended between Portland and the sea, and benefits Portland only, because the river above Portland is absolutely impassable. They have spent $5,400,000 at the present time down here, which makes $54 for every man, woman, and baby in the city of Portland, Oreg., and the only commerce that benefits is the commerce directly between Portland and the sea. The people who reside up here [referring to the map] have to ship their grain by rail down to Portland.

Going forward, the gentleman made some further statements in the same direction, and then he proceeded to say, as I understood him, that candidates for Congress had "promised that the next Congress was going to make an appropriation for the Columbia River; but when we come on the floor of the House the chairman of the committee says it sounds like one of the dreams of Jules Verne."

At that point I sought to interrupt him and he informed me that there was danger that my interruption might spoil his speech, and he declined to be interrupted.

Having been myself for eight years a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and having studied the special and peculiar nomenclature of the rivers in Washington and some of the other objects of appropriation, I remember very accurately some of the appropriations that we made at that time.

Mr. SHATTUC. May I inquire what century the gentleman is referring to?

Mr. GROSVENOR. It was the century in which my friend had probably better have terminated his political career. [Laughter.]

I addressed a letter to the War Department with the view simply of making a correction, with no idea of any criticism of the gentleman; and I received from the Chief of Engineers, General Wilson, a letter which I will put in the RECORD in connection with my remarks, together with his statement of the amount of money which was expended during the time when I was a member of that committee (with the exception of a single appropriation) upon the stretch of rivers up the Columbia Valley above the mouth of the Willamette.

Now, all members of Congress are supposed to know that the city of Portland is situated on the Willamette River, and not on the Columbia, just a few miles above the mouth of that river; and I asked for the appropriations on the Willamette River above Portland, and for the appropriations on the Columbia River above the mouth of the Willamette. H ere is the report:

	Date of first appropriation.	Amount.
Upper Columbia and Snake rivers, from Celilo to the Snake and up the Snake to Asotin	1872	$284,851.92
Columbia River, at Three-mile Rapids (including $20,000 for survey and construction of boat railway from The Dalles to Celilo Falls)	1892	29,708.51
Columbia River, at the Cascades	1876	3,697,348.26

That is one of the points above the mouth of the Willamette, and is an improvement intended to give the great navigation of the mighty Columbia River to the people of the State of Washington.

Operating and care of canal at the Cascades, Columbia River (allotments)	1896	18,948.26
Columbia River, from Vancouver to the mouth of the Willamette River	1892	94,540.98
Columbia River at The Dalles, Celilo Falls, and Three-mile and Ten-mile rapids (survey)	1888	11,830.51
Columbia River, Rock Island Rapids to Priest Rapids (including appropriation of $10,000 for survey)	1890	61,994.80
Columbia River, Rock Island Rapids to Foster Creek Rapids	1894	8,005.20
Willamette River above Portland and Yamhill River, Oregon	1871	429,781.83
Long Tom River, Oregon (tributary of the Willamette)	1899	3,000.00
Snake River between Seven Devils mining district and Huntington Bridge	1893	40,500.00

Making a total for the two rivers—above the mouth of the Willamette on the Columbia Valley and above Portland on the Willamette Valley—of $4,680,510.27.

All this had been done primarily for the improvement of the navigation of the Columbia River, in the interest of developing the resources of the State of Washington; and I considered it then and I consider it now one of the most important works in the Western country.

And, Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that, in the coming years, the full appreciation of Congress will be given to the importance of that mighty river, and ample appropriations made for the development of it in the interest of that region of country.

I only wanted to have the opportunity of saying this, as I stated before, because on the former occasion to which I have referred, and when I made an effort to interrupt the gentleman from Washington, I was not permitted to do so. I desire now to put this on record in vindication of the reputation of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors with reference to the appropriations by Congress for this work. [Applause.]

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I desire the attention of the committee for a very few minutes, as I am anxious that the very distinguished and able chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors shall have just as much of the time remaining as possible in which to close the general debate. I take the floor, therefore, only to call the attention of the committee to a few considerations which I think perhaps have escaped the attention of members in this discussion.

The objections to this bill, Mr. Chairman, as I have been able to gather them from the remarks of members on the floor of the House, group themselves into three distinct classes. One set of gentlemen object to the bill on the ground that it is a discrimination in favor of certain States or sections of the country and against others.

Another set of gentlemen criticise the bill on the ground that it is not broad and national enough in its character, and carries too many projects of purely local interest and importance; and still another set of gentlemen criticise it on the further ground that it does not carry certain projects which are of purely local interest and importance.

The last group of criticisms I hope may be considered as justly made. Indeed, I think, and I am glad to be able to say so, it will be found that they are more justly made as to this measure than they have been as to any other river and harbor bill that has been reported to this House for many years.

The other two groups or classes of objections, however, I desire to notice briefly, and the first is to the partiality of the committee in the distribution of these appropriations.

The other day the gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN] made a speech here which I thought at the time had two objects in view: First, to attract the attention of the House and command its applause, by giving it amusement and entertainment if not instruction, and, second, to make a speech for home consumption which would increase the gentleman's well-deserved importance and popularity with his own people. Certainly he succeeded in the first of these objects, and nobody hopes more than I do that he will succeed in the second.

But, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN] called attention particularly to, and used as object lessons for the establishment of the propositions advanced by him, the appropriations made, as he said, for the State of Ohio, and the appropriations made for the State of Michigan.

Now, I desire to take the figures for those two States as they appear in this bill and ask the attention of the committee to them briefly. And I wish to say in this connection that these figures show that the bill, so far from providing for appropriations of local interest and importance, is general in character and is for the improvement of the great waterways and lines of travel and for the benefit of all the great interests of the country.

The gentleman spread before the House a map of the State of Ohio, with large figures displayed upon it, showing that the appropriations carried by this bill for that State exceeded $6,000,000 in amount, and gave it as an evidence of the partiality of the chairman of the committee for his own State.

But, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman failed to notice, or, if he did notice it, failed to call the attention of the Ho use to the fact that of the $6,000,000 so appropriated, as he said, to Ohio—and he will find on examination this to be a fact—$2,350,000 were appropriated for the improvement of the Ohio River alone. Surely no member of the House can claim for a moment that the improvement of the Ohio River is a local improvement or for the benefit alone of the State of Ohio.

If there is a great national highway in this country it is the Ohio River. The appropriations on this river benefit not alone the State of Ohio, but the States of West Virginia, Pennsylvania, Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois, and all those States bordering the Ohio River and the Mississippi River to its mouth.

As to the other appropriations carried for the State of Ohio, with the exception alone of Muskingum River, for which there was the paltry sum of $10,300 appropriated, all were for the improvement of the great harbors along the southern coast of Lake Erie—Cleveland, with its commerce of more than 7,000,000 tons (let any member figure out the number of ships that it will take to carry that enormous tonnage); Ashtabula, with its tonnage of more than 4,500,000 tons; Conneaut, with its tonnage of more than 2,500,000 tons; Fairport, with its tonnage of nearly 2,000,000 tons, and other ports which might be named.

Now, Mr. Chairman, these ports along the southern coast of Lake

Erie are great gathering points for the products which come down from the upper lakes to be distributed as far east as Boston and as far south as West Virginia and Maryland; for let it be known, if it is not already known, that a very large part of the grain which comes down from the upper lakes finds its ocean port at the city of Baltimore, and the iron ore that comes down from the upper lakes finds its use not only in the State of Ohio, but also in the States of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York, and West Virginia.

So that these ports can in no sense be considered as local and important only to the State of Ohio. They are national in their character, and the entire country receives the benefit in decreased freight rates and in the decreased cost of the enormous quantities and myriad forms of iron and steel which are used all over the country.

And so with the grain which finds its points of shipments East, after passing over the lakes and connecting channels, at these ports. The benefit of this great waterway can in part be realized when we recollect that a bushel of wheat is carried from Duluth to Buffalo, a distance of about a thousand miles, for about one-third, and sometimes much less, of what it takes to bring a bushel of wheat from Fargo to Duluth (and there are competing railroads between these points), a distance of about 250 miles.

Now, when we come to the State of Michigan, what do we find? The gentleman from Washington exhibits here a map of the State of Michigan, with large figures marked upon it, showing, as he says, appropriations for that State of more than $7,000,000. Let us examine these figures.

If the members of this House will call to mind the map of the United States, they will find along the northern border of Michigan what is known as the St. Marys River, between Michigan and Canada, a natural water highway connecting Lake Superior with Lake Huron. Of the $7,000,000 and over which the gentleman mentioned, four and a half million dollars have been appropriated for this river.

If gentlemen will come a little farther down, they will find the St. Clair Flats Canal, for which in this bill is carried an appropriation of $330,000. If they will come a little farther down they will find the Detroit River, for which is carried in this bill an appropriation, cash and deferred, of $1,750,000.

Besides these appropriations there are two or three small appropriations for certain harbors of refuge in which the State of Michigan is not interested locally at all, but in which the great commerce of the national highway is interested as harbors of refuge for the many vessels which ply along those waters. So we find that of the $7,500,000 which the gentleman charged to the State of Michigan, $6,630,000 are properly chargeable to this great national waterway.

The importance of the St. Marys River can not well be exaggerated, when we consider the country to which it furnishes a means of transportation. All that country which finds its nearest lake shipping port at Duluth and Superior, including all of the States of Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, and even extending as far west as the State of the gentleman from Washington himself, and parts of the States of Wisconsin, Iowa, Kansas, and Nebraska.

All the products coming from this vast territory find their nearest lake shipping port at the harbors of Duluth and Superior. All the grain which comes from the great grainery of the Northwest, and almost all the iron ore from the great mines of Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Michigan, find their line of transportation along that route. And all the heavy freights going West also find their way along this same line.

So that, Mr. Chairman, there goes through this one St. Marys River in seven months of one year—mark the figures—about as much tonnage as goes through the Suez Canal, carrying the commerce of Europe and Asia, in three full years.

A few years ago Senator Davis astonished the country by saying that there was as much tonnage through that river as through the Suez Canal in one year.

Now it has gone to that point where there is as much tonnage there in seven months as goes through the Suez Canal in three years. And when we come down to the Detroit River and the St. Clair Flats Canal, we find in addition all that tonnage which finds its nearest lake shipping port at the great city of Chicago, making with that coming from Lake Superior a tonnage as great in seven months of one year, or nearly as great, as goes through the Suez Canal in five years. If you will mark off a territory fan-shaped and radiating for hundreds of miles from Chicago, you will find a part of the United States as fertile and productive as any country on earth, finding its nearest lake shipping port for its vast productions at Chicago, and contributing to the magnificent tonnage which finds its way to the East along this great waterway. Surely this is a great national commercial highway. And yet the appropriations made for this great line of water communication are charged to the State of Michigan by the gentleman from Washington.

Now, when we come to the East, what States are interested there? All those from the Lakes as far east as Maine, and as far south as Maryland. Why, Mr. Chairman, all the States of this Union are directly and indirectly interested in this magnificent waterway.

Surely, Mr. Chairman, if any figures could be produced to show the policy of this committee, and show it in such light that no man can misunderstand it, these very figures are the ones. Out of appropriations of $6,000,000, which the gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN] charges to the State of Ohio, only $10,300 is properly chargeable to that State, even if that may be so charged, and out of $7,500,000 charged by him to the State of Michigan, $6,630,000 is properly chargeable to this great national and international waterway.

Gentlemen will be able to see how a cursory and superficial examination of figures can mislead even a gentleman of the great acuteness of the gentleman from Washington.

Now, there was also exhibited to the House, as showing the partiality of the committee, appropriations for the State of Minnesota amounting to $210,000, and this amount was compared with the $130,000 for the State of Washington.

The gentleman from Washington will perhaps be surprised when I say to him that at the harbor of Duluth and Superior and another harbor within 30 miles of the city of Duluth there goes in and out during the seven months of every year a tonnage more than seven times as great as goes on all the rivers of the State of Washington, leaving out the Columbia River, and on all Puget Sound put together. [Applause.]

There goes in and out at these two harbors more than 16,000,000 tons of freight; there goes out and in at the harbor of Duluth and Superior alone more than 11,500,000 tons of freight; and it is the great waterway which accommodates the commerce which finds its shipping point there and all along the upper lakes and its receiving points along the south shore of Lake Erie which we have sought by these appropriations to improve and render safe.

It seems to me that these considerations would be enough to show the House the policy on which the committee has proceeded. And what is that policy? That this Congress shall make appropriations to improve and develop those great natural highways which will develop and increase the commerce of the country and decrease the freights to the people of the country.

It is true that we did have to put in this bill a number of small streams; but if they are examined they will be found to be feeders, as it were, to the main lines. One, the port of Ludington, in the State of Michigan, has a tonnage greater than all the tonnage of Puget Sound. When they consider these figures, gentlemen will easily see what the character of the bill is. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Oregon is recognized.

Mr. TONGUE. Mr. Chairman, it was not my original purpose to address the House upon the pending bill. I should not do so now but for the strange statements and extraordinary mistakes occurring in the remarks of the gentleman from Washington. I listened to his speech, as I am sure other members of the House did, with great interest and with great enjoyment. My pleasure at the exuberance and brilliancy of its wit was only equaled by my astonishment at the extravagance of its misstatements. As production of fiction, it was certainly unique and amusing. When attempting to deal with sober reality, it was remarkable, chiefly for the great number of facts it contains that are not so.

Had the gentleman laid aside his jesting for a few minutes and condescended to answer plain questions that might have corrected some of his mistakes and explained others; had he devoted one-fourth of the time in the preparation of facts for the information of the House that he had in preparing jests for its entertainment; had he consulted the reports of the engineers with anything like the assiduity he consulted ancient editions of classic joke books, it would not have been necessary for me to reply to his remarks, and I certainly should not have desired to do so. For something like an hour and a quarter the gentleman furnished the House with a great deal of amusement, but with a remarkably small amount of instruction. It was not shown, nor did he attempt to show, that this bill contains a single appropriation for a river or harbor that is not meritorious or which ought not to be made. He has not furnished us with a single fact or reason or argument to show why an appropriation should be made for a single river or harbor not included in this bill. The speech was chiefly a complaint against the plan of the universe and the handiwork of its Creator.

It is a complaint that harbors and the mouths of rivers are located upon the seacoast and the shores of the Great Lakes. It is a complaint that North Dakota was not located upon the Gulf of Mexico or Colorado upon the shores of Lake Michigan, so that they might have rivers and harbors worthy of improvement. To complain that Illinois receives more appropriation under this bill than Iowa is to overlook the fact that the commerce of Iowa is provided for by deepening the harbors of the Great Lakes. The commerce not only of Illinois but of Iowa, Nebraska, Wyoming, Idaho, Nevada, Colorado, and a large portion of the commerce from that vast territory stretching from Wisconsin to the shores of the Pacific, including the State which the gentleman in part represents, flows outward to find a market through the harbors of the great city of Chicago. When the gentleman would defeat this bill and obstruct those improvements which have been listed under the name of Michigan, he would paralyze the commerce of the entire northern portion of the United States, including that of the State of Washington.

A very large portion of the commerce that traverses the rivers and canals the improvements of which are listed under the State of Michigan passes by Michigan without stopping and is furnished by the two great continental railroads that have their termini in the State of Washington. Hostility to those improvements obstructs access to markets for the production of that vast territory through which runs, with its feeders, the Great Northern Railroad, which terminates at Seattle, in the gentleman's own State, and is doing more to build up the commerce of the city of Seattle and the State of Washington than any other force in existence. Hostility to these improvements is hostility to every settlement through which runs the Northern Pacific Railroad, the great railroad whose chief terminus is the city in which the gentleman resides, the city which owes its birth and growth and present greatness to the fostering care of the Northern Pacific Railroad. The complaint against the appropriation for the city of New York is well answered by the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. ALEXANDER], that the exports and imports passing through that great city are more than double the exports and imports of the 28 States that are not represented on the River and Harbor Committee. But these exports and imports are not for New York alone.

The great streams of commerce that pour their treasures into the harbors of New York are formed and filled by rivulets having their sources in every hamlet, in every home, in every camp, in every portion of the land, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico. It is the commerce of our entire country. There is is not a woodman in any forest, a plowman in any valley, a herder upon any plain who does not with every stroke of the ax, with the turning of every furrow, at every movement of his camp, contribute something to build up the great wealth of commerce that flows through the harbor of this metropolis of the United States. We can not by one stroke, in any one way, better provide for the commerce of the entire land than by suitable appropriations to deepen the harbors of the city of New York. If the 17 States represented on the River and Harbor Committee receive 75 per cent of the appropriations 80 per cent of the commerce of the entire country passes through the rivers and harbors of those States, the improvements of which are provided for in this bill.

But it is not my intention to further pursue this line of remarks. I am concerned most with an endeavor to correct some of the serious mistakes of the gentleman respecting the appropriations in which the State of Oregon and the State of Washington are directly interested. At some trouble and some expense he had prepared a map representing the North Pacific States. Upon the center of the map of Washington was written the sum of $130,000. Upon the center of the map of Oregon was written $2,340,500. Upon the map of the State of Idaho was written $0,000,000. Then the gentleman turns to the House triumphantly and demands to know if it is necessary for him to say which State was represented on the River and Harbor Committee. The gentleman probably intended to convey to the House—the trend of his remarks certainly did convey to the House—the impression that the State of Washington receives through this bill appropriations amounting only to $130,000, while the State of Oregon receives appropriations to the amount of $2,340,500. To show how mistaken such an impression must be I need only to say that, of the sum which the gentleman charges to the State of Oregon $2,174,000 is appropriated for the improvement of the Columbia River, which is more in Washington than in Oregon, and for the improvement of the Snake River, the navigable portion of which is wholly within the States of Washington and Idaho. This leaves only the sum of $166,500 to be expended wholly within the State of Oregon.

Let me call your attention to the fact that the Columbia River forms a part of the boundary between the State of Oregon and the State of Washington; that it is nowhere—even for one foot of its length—wholly within the State of Oregon; that it forms the northern boundary of Oregon five-sevenths of the distance across the State. It then passes entirely within the State of Washington and extends a distance of hundreds of miles. The Snake River, that forms a part of this system of improvement, runs partly through Idaho, then entirely in the State of Washington. There is one navigable river enters the Columbia River from Oregon. Four navigable rivers enter the Columbia River from Washington, all four of which receive appropriations under this bill.

Wherever Oregon is along the south bank of the river Washington is on the north bank. For hundreds of miles Washington is on both banks of the river. There is three times as much of Washington as of Oregon adjacent to the Columbia River, tributary to the Columbia River, and whose products are within easy reach of the Columbia River. It is true—and in this particular the State of Washington is extremely fortunate—it has other outlets for its commerce to the sea, and the products of the northern portion of the State find an outlet through the waters of Puget Sound. But there is still a very large portion of the State, a productive portion of the State, a portion of the State embracing millions of acres of the finest wheat fields in the world, that has no other convenient outlet except down the Columbia River. There is a large portion of territory whose only railroad facilities are railroads that transfer their produce down the Columbia River to the sea.

I have here a picture that may interest the gentleman from Washington, clipped from the leading paper of the Northwest, and which I received yesterday, presenting in a very striking light the interests that some of the constituents of the gentlemen have in the improvement of that river. It represents 70,000 sacks of wheat at Columbus, on the Columbia River, in Klickitat County, within the State of Washington, waiting for transportation upon a ferry to be carried to the railroad on the south side of the river, to be shipped down the river, and find its way out to the sea. This one county of that State sends annually across and down the Columbia River 350,000 bushels of wheat, which has no other way of access to market, by steamboat, railroad, or otherwise. In the southeast portion of the State of Washington, in the vicinity of Lewiston, Idaho, embracing a small portion of Idaho and a very small portion of Oregon, is what is called the "Lewiston country" or "Clearwater country."

I hold a pamphlet issued by the Lewiston Commercial Club, in which it is stated that this country comprises 6,200,000 acres of land; that its only natural, logical, commercial outlet is by way of the Snake and Columbia rivers to the Pacific Ocean; that where 50,000 people now dwell it can furnish homes for 350,000 more; that it is capable of producing 25,000,000 bushels of wheat annually, and that the present wheat production of what it terms the inland empire, tributary to the Columbia, is now 35,000,000 bushels annually. I am told by the Representative from Idaho that practically the whole of the Idaho wheat production, 8,000,000 bushels annually, whenever it finds a market, travels down and out of the Columbia River. I am told by the gentleman's colleague from Washington that that portion of the State of Washington that lies to the south and east of the Columbia River and Snake River, called the "Palouse country," produces annually 20,000,000 bushels of wheat. This is practically double the amount of wheat that is annually shipped out of the State of Washington, except down and out the Columbia River. The gentleman himself states:

> The upper part of the Columbia and its sister streams, the Snake and the Clearwater, drain a rich and mighty inland empire that produced this year something like 30,000,000 bushels of wheat.

In view of these facts, it is very singular to me—it was very unexpected, and I think as unexpected to the gentleman's colleagues as myself—that the gentleman should charge the appropriations for this river as an appropriation wholly for the benefit of the State of Oregon. It was a still greater surprise that the gentleman should so vigorously oppose an appropriation that concerns so deeply so many of his constituents and which will benefit, directly and indirectly, every resident of his State. Cheapen the transportation down the Columbia River for the product of the range and farm of southern Washington, and the railroads will meet the cut for like produce from the northern part of the State. The gentleman's colleagues realize this fact. In this connection it gives me a great deal of pleasure to be able to point to the attitude of two of the gentleman's colleagues, one of whom resides at the same city with the gentleman himself. These men are broad-minded. They realize that the city of Tacoma is not the State of Washington. They are broad enough, liberal enough, to represent the entire State which they have been elected to represent, and to protect the interests of all portions of their constituency.

In response to a letter written by the Portland Chamber of Commerce, asking these gentlemen to assist the delegation from Oregon and the delegation from Idaho in securing appropriations for the improvement of the mouth of the Columbia River, the Senator from Washington [Mr. FOSTER] writes:

> I am in receipt of your favor with reference to an appropriation for the improvement of the mouth of the Columbia River, recommended by the Chief of Engineers. * * * I shall be very glad to continue to give careful attention to this important project, which has to do with one of the great waterways of our country. I have already consulted with General Wilson on the premises, and am quite familiar with his views.

The gentleman's colleague from the House, who resides farther in the eastern section of the State, nearer to the part of the State most benefited by this improvement, writes as follows:

> You may rest assured that the whole delegation is interested in this matter, and will cooperate with Oregon and Idaho in the endeavor to secure the appropriation. Our main reliance in the matter, however, is Mr. TONGUE, who is a member of the committee, and therefore is in a position to insist upon having the matter taken up and cared for. I have already urged the matter on several different occasions.

The Oregonian, published at Portland, Oreg., and the leading paper of the Northwest, commenting upon the river and harbor bill as reported to Congress, contains the following statement:

Let us give credit where credit is due, but let us also give credit to the Washington and Idaho delegations at Washington for the Snake and Columbia River appropriations. If these rivers flowed through Oregon, we might have less to pat ourselves on the back about.

In the next edition, when the Oregonian shall seek to give credit where credit is due, it will be compelled, I fear, to except the gentleman from Washington, upon whose remarks I am now commenting.

These gentlemen, with the Representative from Idaho, recognize that any sum expended for the improvement of the Columbia River is not a local improvement; it is not an improvement merely for the benefit of the State of Oregon; it is an improvement in the completion of which the whole of the State of Washington, the whole of the State of Oregon, and the whole of the State of Idaho are intensely interested and intensely eager to see prosecuted to completion.

I am not going to underestimate the importance of the improvement of the Columbia River to the State of Oregon. It furnishes the channel through which every pound of Oregon's commerce into other lands must ultimately pass. Its maintenance is essential to the life and commercial supremacy of the city of Portland. But while this is true, its present and continual improvement is absolutely essential to the full developments of the entire north Pacific coast.

But this representation that the improvements of the Columbia River are local to the State of Oregon is not the only serious mistake made by that gentleman. Since he is delaying so long the publication of his remarks in the RECORD, I am not able to quote what he now thinks he ought to have said, but by the aid of the notes of the official stenographer I am able to quote what he actually said. Here is a portion of his remarks:

There has always been a controversy as to where these appropriations should be made on the Columbia River. * * * The appropriations have always been made, up to the present time, on the Columbia River at the mouth of the river, between the city of Portland and the mouth. The chief appropriations, I say, have been made there. Now, I wish to call attention to one or two items of appropriations that have been made on the Columbia River. In the first place, there has been expended between the city of Portland and the Columbia River $160,000 at one time, $155,000 at another time, $190,000 at another time, and the present bill increases the amount to about $830,000.

When it is remembered that the commerce tributary to the Columbia River passes through the city of Portland and does not pass through Tacoma, the city in which the gentleman resides, the reasons for attempting to make this statement are somewhat apparent, but there are no reasons—there can be no reasons—why the gentleman should have made such a serious and great mistake in the presentation of the alleged facts. His statements of the appropriations by the Federal Government for the improvement of the Willamette River are erroneous in every particular. The total appropriations by the Federal Government for the improvement of the Willamette River between the city of Portland and the Columbia River, made separate from other improvements, have aggregated the sum of $160,365, but the city of Portland itself has expended in this improvement, in round numbers, about $800,000.

It is not easy to get the exact amount of appropriations for the Columbia River below the mouth of the Willamette. In most instances they have included appropriations for the improvement of the Willamette for a distance of 12 miles below the city of Portland. Up to the meeting of the present Congress the entire amounts appropriated by the General Government for the improvement of the Willamette River below Portland and the Columbia River below the mouth of the Willamette has been $3,165,680. The commerce along this portion of the river is 1,489,708 tons, and will soon be many times that amount. The number of passengers carried out of the State aggregate annually 262,000. For the same period of time the appropriations by Congress for the improvement of the Columbia River above the mouth of the Willamette, including the improvement of the Snake River, have been $4,412,546.13, while the freight upon that river as yet is exceedingly small compared with the freight on the lower river, and must always remain so.

Out of the lower river will go practically all the commerce of the upper river, the commerce carried on three transcontinental railroads, on the local railroads, and the Willamette River. In other words, Congress has appropriated for the Upper Columbia River, including the Snake River, $1,242,866 more than it has appropriated for the Lower Columbia River, with almost one hundred times the commerce. Congress has appropriated 40 per cent more for the Upper Columbia than for the lower portion, including the Willamette River, with many, many times the commerce. Yet in the face of these facts accessible to the gentleman from Washington, for ignorance of which he has no excuse, he claims that Congress has discriminated against the Upper Columbia in favor of the lower portion of the same river. It requires some hardihood in a member of the House, addressing an audience of 75,000,000 of people, to make such a statement so much at variance with the actual recorded facts.

The gentleman informed us that some two thousand years ago some man by the name of Cæsar Julius, or Julius Cæsar, divided Gaul into three parts, and he indulged in some speculation as to what Cæsar would do had he lived to the beginning of the twentieth century. In the light of the gentleman's speech I can furnish him a fairly accurate answer to that question. If Cæsar had lived to our day, had been a member of this Congress, had beheld the gentleman from Washington, and listened to his speech, he would have concluded that history had much maligned him; in fact, that "gall" had never been divided; that it was still in the original package; that its integrity had been fully preserved, and that the gentleman from Washington was in possession of, not only the real thing, but of the whole thing. [Applause.] In fact, this slander against imperial Cæsar has been so constantly refuted that I am surprised the gentleman should have repeated it. If he had consulted a more modern edition of the story books he would have found that this, as well as the claim that a "Congressman running at large" is dangerous to the peace and safety of the community, have been discarded as long ago having outlived their usefulness.

If the gentleman had devoted one-tenth of the time during the week or ten days that he has spent in the preparation of his speech in the examination of the reports of the engineering officers that he had in the preparation of his jests, he would not have been compelled to draw upon his imagination for his facts while drawing upon his memory for his wit.

But had the greater portion of the improvements been made at the mouth of the Columbia River, and from there to the mouth of the Willamette, a distance of about 80 miles, where the largest portion of the commerce is carried, would it have been unusual? I trust that the gentleman will yet learn that the proper way to begin to improve a river is at its mouth, not at its source, where it enters the ocean or another navigable river rather than where it passes through canyons between snow-capped mountains.

The improvements should first go where the greatest benefits can be derived. It would be of no value to the people along the upper portion of this river to improve it at their doors without improving it at its mouth. It would be useless to give them facilities for getting freight into the river without facilities for getting it out of the river at its junction with the ocean.

But this is not a full catalogue of the singular mistakes of that very singular but amusing speech. When the gentleman finally edits his speech for the RECORD and decides what he wishes he had said, unless he makes many material changes, he should entitle it not "The Mistakes of Moses," but "The Mistakes of CUSHMAN." [Applause.]

I quote again from the stenographic notes of the speech:

Now, the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army makes some statements regarding the expenditures at the mouth of the Columbia River. In the first place, the former appropriations for the mouth of the Columbia River have been about $2,225,000. When they started in spending money on the mouth of the Columbia River they had 31 feet of water. After they had spent three-quarters of a million of dollars, they took another sounding and they then had 28 feet of water. Then they spent three-quarters of a million more, and now they have 24 feet of water. The question now resolves itself into one of arithmetical proportion. If we have spent over $5,000,000 between the city of Portland and the sea to produce a deep channel, and we have 7 feet less water now than we had when we started, how much water shall we have when we have spent $5,000,000 more?

Still venting hostility against the Columbia River. "Still harping upon my daughter." The Columbia River seems to haunt the gentleman in his waking as well as his dreaming hours. He seems to have some peculiar animus against it. I remember a distinguished professor who, endeavoring to impress upon his pupils the evils of eating a hearty supper of mince pie, said that after indulging in a meal of that kind he had a dream, and in his dream the professor was lying flat on his back, with His Satanic Majesty astride his breast thrusting mince pie down his throat with a pitchfork. By the time the gentleman from Washington is through with this bill and retires to peaceful slumbers, in his dreams he will imagine that the waters of the Columbia River are overwhelming him; that its fierce cataracts are endeavoring to force their way through the capacious space between the gentleman's lips, and are washing the foundations from the commercial prosperity of the city of Tacoma. [Applause.]

But, again, to correct these misstatements. I have already shown that the appropriations expended both in the Willamette and the Columbia River below the mouth of the Willamette, including the mouth of the Columbia, have exceeded but little over $3,000,000 instead of $5,000,000, as stated in the gentleman's speech. It now remains to point out the wonderful inaccuracy of the wonderful results produced by the expenditure of that money. If the gentleman should turn to the report of Captain Langfitt upon the survey of this river, he will find this statement in reference to the improvements at the mouth of the Columbia River:

Active operations began in April, 1885, to construct a jetty, the location of which is shown on plate 1. Work was continued with more or less interruption until October, 1895, when the present jetty was completed. * * * The channel depth in 1885 was 20 feet, and remained so to include 1889. In 1890 its depth was 24 feet; in 1891, 27 feet; in 1892, 23 feet; in 1893 and 1894, 29 feet; in 1895, 31 feet.

This jetty was built at an expense, I think, of about $1,300,000, and was one of the most successful in the history of engineering improvements. It is true that a portion of this jetty, something, I think, near half a mile of it, from defective construction or otherwise, has seriously settled, destroying part of its usefulness, and some 4 or 5 feet of the depth of water originally gained has since been lost. It is this fact that has made the present project necessary to make the improvement permanent and complete. But while the sinking of this jetty has been unfortunate, and while it has caused considerable shoaling of the bar, there is still an increase of depth of some 5 or 6 feet of water, instead of decrease of a depth of 7 feet, according to the statement of the gentleman from Washington.

Now, if the gentleman will turn to another portion of the Report of the Chief of Engineers for 1900, pages 3452 and 4418, volume 6, he will find that the original project for the improvement of the Columbia from the mouth of the Willamette to the mouth of the Columbia only contemplated the giving of 20 feet of water where about 15 and in some places 12 feet previously existed, and that the completion of the project "has resulted in maintaining a fairly good channel from Portland to the mouth of the Columbia River of from 20 to 23 feet deep at low water," and that now "ships drawing from 20 to 24 feet freely ascend that river to the city of Portland." I present the statement of the Report of Engineers as an offset to the statement of the gentleman from Washington, and without further comment upon that subject.

I regret to see the gentleman exhibit this hostile attitude against the improvement of the Columbia River. I regret that unfortunately he has overlooked the fact that Tacoma is not the State of Washington; that the inhabitants of that magnificent young city, one of the most prosperous on the Pacific coast, that has had a marvelous growth in the past, as it will have in the future, do not share the gentleman's hostility to other cities or to the improvement of this great river. I believe the people of that city are firmly convinced that their future growth does not depend upon tearing others down, does not depend upon the effort to thwart the progress of others, and, above all, that it does not depend upon any attempt to injure the commercial opportunities that are being afforded by this bill to a very large section of the State of Washington.

It is useless to profess friendship for the upper river while opposing improvement of the lower. He has indulged in statements about the improvements of the lower river which, if true, furnish abundant reasons why Congress should not appropriate one dollar for the removal of the obstructions at The Dalles and Celilo. He has attempted to strike a fatal blow at the improvement of every portion of that great commercial highway. I hope the gentleman's attitude of hostility to the Columbia River is not caused by any regrets at seeing a large portion of the products of his magnificent young State finding their way to the sea and their access to ocean vessels that transfer them to foreign lands without traversing the city in which he lives. The course of this commerce will not change. Nothing that he can do or that I can neglect to do will change the ordinary course of nature. If I should be allowed to address him in some of his own extravagant language, some of the hyperbole which the gentleman can so skillfully use, I should say to him, "'You may live long enough to mount the sunbeams to the ethereal heavens; you may live to slide back to earth on the Milky Way; you may live to unbuckle the bellyband of the universe,' but you will never live long enough to see the commerce, the products of the rich wheat fields along the banks of and adjacent to the Columbia River, leave their accustomed course down the banks of the Columbia River to the sea in order to climb the summits of the Cascade Mountains to find an outlet upon the waters of Puget Sound."

But I am not yet through with a catalogue of the gentleman's mistakes. I have still another chapter upon "the mistakes of CUSHMAN." He charges that Congress had victimized Washington; that his State has been discriminated against; that there has been unjust favoritism shown to the State of Oregon and against the State of Washington. Let me correct some more of the gentleman's imagination by a statement of facts. The last two river and harbor bills, the one in 1896 and the one in 1899, have carried for the State of Washington, in appropriations and authorized contracts, which will be fully carried out, the sum of $1,763,000. This money has been largely expended. The remainder of it is now being expended entirely within the State of Washington, not upon borders between that and any other State.

There was carried for Grays Harbor alone $1,000,000; for Everett Harbor alone, $392,000. During the same period of time, carried by the same bills, the appropriations and authorizations for the State of Oregon that were approved by the Department, all the appropriations that have been or are being actually expended and to be expended entirely within the State of Oregon, amounted only to the sum of $685,390, a little over one-third as much to be expended entirely within the State of Oregon as was expended entirely within the State of Washington. And yet when those two bills were framed—when the largest one the State of Washington has ever had was framed and passed—Oregon had a member of the River and Harbor Committee in the House, a member of the Committee on Commerce in the Senate, and the State of Washington had neither. When the last bill was passed, the State of Oregon had a member of the Committee on Commerce in the Senate, and Washington had a member of neither committee.

I put these facts, and they are facts that can be found of record, against the claim of the gentleman from Washington that Congress has discriminated in favor of Oregon and against Washington. During the same time the same two bills carried appropriations for the Snake River and the Columbia River above the mouth of the Willamette, which is more in Washington than in Oregon—$333,597. Of this sum $12,000 was wholly in Washington and Idaho; $57,000 between Vancouver and the mouth of the Willamette River, wholly for the State of Washington. There was expended on the Willamette River below Portland and the Columbia below the mouth of the Willamette $371,000, a total for the Columbia and Snake rivers of $704,597.

Now, if the gentleman should indulge his imagination, should charge the sums expended in those two bills upon the Columbia River and Snake River wholly to the State of Oregon, still these appropriations would only aggregate the sum of $1,389,897 during the last five years. During these five years all the sums appropriated and authorized and expended for Oregon in river and harbor improvements, including all the sums appropriated and expended for the Columbia and Snake rivers through river and harbor bills, amount to only a little more than about 60 per cent of the sums expended entirely within the State of Washington. The rivers and harbors within Washington are being well taken care of under existing contracts, while there are no contracts under way in Oregon. I place these facts—the treatment Washington has received from Oregon Senators and Oregon Congressmen—against the gentleman's statements that Congress has discriminated in favor of Oregon and against the State of Washington.

It certainly is not the gentleman's misfortune; it certainly is to the good fortune of his State, that its rivers and harbors have been so well taken care of in previous Congresses that its real wants and necessities are exceedingly few. In the same line and in connection with this I want to call attention to another of the "mistakes of CUSHMAN." In the table that he has placed before the House he has endeavored to show or claim that in the States represented by the members of the River and Harbor Committee a much larger proportion of the recommendations of the engineers had been adopted. In pursuance of this plan, he has alleged that the engineers have recommended appropriations for the State of Washington for $630,000, while they have received but $130,000. I have asked the gentleman for the items which compose this sum, but as yet have not received them. I controvert the statement as to the amount recommended by the Chief of Engineers.

I hold before me the Book of Estimates, which contains the amount which the Chief of Engineers recommends can be appropriated or, rather, that can be profitably used within the State of Washington for the coming fiscal year. The total amount is $246,000, instead of $630,000. In this sum was included $125,000 for a ship canal between the Sound and Lake Washington. There have been appropriated at different times for this project $175,000, but about $5,000 has been expended in four years, leaving on hand something like $170,000. At this rate of expenditure the committee thought further appropriations unnecessary, and made none. Outside of that appropriation, the recommendations were for $121,000.

In recommending this amount the engineers had overlooked $32,719.49 on hand for the improvements of Puget Sound and its tributary waters. This left but $88,280.59, and we have appropriated $130,000. It is possible that in making up the $630,000 the gentleman has included projects reported by the engineers, including the improvement at Tacoma. This might be a fair method if he had followed it in other States; but if he had followed the same method in the State of Oregon, and followed also his method of charging the Columbia and Snake rivers to Oregon, he would have found that the recommendations of the engineers, including the projects that they have heretofore approved and recommended, covered, instead of less than $1,012,000, something over $10,000,000. He would have found that, instead of appropriating the large per cent which I think he claimed, something like 98 per cent, we would have appropriated for Oregon less than 8 per cent. But if he includes the Tacoma project in his estimates, it is not recommended by the engineers, except conditionally.

Captain Langfitt, after stating that the project is for dredging the city waterway from Eleventh street to Fourteenth street, states as follows:

In my opinion the improvement outlined in the report—that is, dredging in the city waterway—is a worthy improvement, and is urgently needed at the present time. Whether this improvement should be made by the Government or by private interests, on account of the conditions surrounding this waterway, as explained in the report, seems uncertain to me, and I have left this question open for higher authority to decide.

It is further stated that the harbor outside of this waterway is of ample depth, needs no improvement, and the contemplated improvement is for the purpose of securing further dockage, and will be of inestimable value to private property. No recommendations were made for any appropriation in the present bill, as recommendations are rarely made in any new project until it has been approved by Congress.

I might point out further mistakes of this remarkable speech of the gentleman. It was very entertaining, it was very amusing. Like other members of the House, I was delighted to hear it. It furnished needed recreation and food for merriment. But I regret exceedingly, as I think some of his best friends from Washington regret, that he should have found it necessary in endeavoring to secure recognition for his own State to assail his neighbors or any other portion of the Union. I have no such animosity to any portion of the State that the gentleman represents. It has no river or harbor the improvement of which I should not rejoice to see. If the gentleman should succeed, by amendment in this House or in the Senate, in securing additional sums for the improvement of any additional harbors or rivers within his State, none will rejoice more than I.

That the appropriations for his State are not larger is attributable to no fault or neglect of mine. After listening to the very able remarks of his colleagues, I am inclined to think that possibly this committee may have overlooked a worthy improvement at Grays Harbor. If the House should concur in this view, there would certainly be no objection from me or any Representative from the State of Oregon. The gentleman will always find, his colleagues will always find, that in any effort to build up his magnificent State—and in present resources and prospect for future development it is one of the grandest and most magnificent States in the Union—he will find the delegation from Oregon, in House and Senate, standing by him, hand in hand, shoulder to shoulder, ready to render him every help within their power. He will find us neighbors and friends, ready to work in friendship in building up—not enemies, laboring in hostility to pull down his State, cripple its progress, or retard its prosperity. [Loud applause.]

During the delivery of the above remarks the time of Mr. TONGUE expired.

Mr. TONGUE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes more to answer these statements.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked by the gentleman from Oregon to continue his remarks for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TONGUE resumed and concluded his remarks.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. MAHON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. CUNNINGHAM, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 5019. An act granting an increase of pension to Julia Crenshaw; and

S. 5346. An act making provision for the employment of clerical assistance in the district of Alaska.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendment, the bill (H. R. 11008) authorizing the Solicitor of the Treasury to quitclaim and release certain title and interest of the United States to Mrs. Lutie M. Nowlin.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

[Mr. SPARKMAN addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana is recognized.

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I regard the river and harbor bill as second in importance and value to none of the great appropriation bills of this Government. I know of no bill that for the amount appropriated brings so great a return in benefits to the people, to the farmers and the producing classes, to our commercial interests, and to the public Treasury. Commerce is the great adjunct of civilization, industry, and progress. Nature provides us with the lakes, rivers, harbors—all these arteries and facilities for commerce. They are its necessary agencies and instrumentalities. As the country is cleared and trees are felled and other work of man goes on, streams once deep are filled up, harbors are clogged or grow more shallow, and appliances of science must be invoked to restore the bounty of nature—to correct this deterioration.

This incident of growth would alone necessitate a river and harbor bill, or the action of Government in some form and mode; but there is another reason also the result of man's development in civilization. The vessels necessary for the transportation of products can carry more cheaply in proportion to their enlarged size, and the new competition of trade is leading every day to an increased tonnage, to larger ships, and a demand for a greater draft. The same law applies to ships of war. The safety and defense of nations require bigger ships, greater drafts, and the easiests possible access to the sea.

In Europe vast sums have been expended on such public works. Projects of this sort have received the most liberal bounty of great nations, far exceeding any of our expenditures, the amount of business being considered. Such improvements are the pride and glory of European civilization. Very often they have created in Europe harbors for commerce and refuge where they never existed before. Such wise expenditure no rational man would criticise. Our own great engineers have freely availed themselves of the experience and skill of the hydraulic engineers of the Old World, and as they have other new and greater problems to solve, far greater results to achieve, they need not fear a comparison with their brethren of the Old World when their work commenced to be reviewed. [Applause.]

There has been at some periods and among certain classes in this country a sentiment that would cripple all this wise and beneficent action of the National Government by turning over this whole business of improvement to municipal or State expenditure, with the knowledge that the effect would be to discourage and minimize the work to be performed. Some of these wiseacres will tell you that water transportation is no longer necessary for the interior; that the railroads can haul everything, transport all your freight, and that once relieved from the competition of the water routes they will bring down their charges to a minimum. As for the harbors on the coast, these great outlets for commerce, their programme is to leave everything to the local authorities. How much of private interest, folly, ignorance, and absence of thought has entered into such suggestions it would be hard to compute.

The people of this country have long since settled this whole question. Their own good sense and the necessities of commerce have conducted them to a right conclusion. If the improvement of a particular river be devolved upon a State, how shall we adjust the amount that this State or that should pay for improving the Mississippi, the Red River, the Columbia, the Ohio, or the Potomac? How many States are interested in the improvement of Boston Harbor, of New York Harbor, of Philadelphia's great river, the Delaware, of Baltimore, or the channels between the great waters? It is necessary, therefore, that the work of improvement shall be carried on by the Federal Government.

To secure wise, economical expenditure and a proper choice of objects for the expenditure, the whole subject is committed to the Engineer Bureau of the United States Army. They are to examine the project for improvement, determine whether it is possible, ascertain the commerce of the locality and the value of the proposed work to commerce, and report to Congress. Where will you find a body of more competent, skillful, and trustworthy employees? Their work must be approved by the Chief of Engineers, and then it comes to Congress for an appropriation. You have next the scrutiny of a committee—generally a very able one—and last you have the scrutiny of the House itself and the Senate, the test of debate and of public criticism, including the public press. This does not insure abstract perfection in every item, but where will you find a better system and better securities against mistake, error, or fraud in any of the agencies by which our great appropriation bills are prepared and matured? [Applause.]

There was a time, Mr. Chairman, when the river and harbor bill was more open to criticism than now, and less carefully prepared. I refer to the years that immediately followed the great civil war. It was then a sectional bill. The South was neglected—I believe almost ignored—in the appropriations. But this state of things did not last very long. Justice was done to our section of the country, and for years it was the only bill in which the South was fairly treated. For a number of years the South and the West have been liberally treated in this bill, and for the measure to fail would be to the people of the South a positive calamity as well as a blow to the nation's commerce and purposes.

There was a time when a portion of the press of the Eastern cities was prejudiced against the bill. Articles were written against the bill by persons who knew nothing of the commercial interests involved in this or that appropriation, and in their ignorance they assumed that these appropriations were mere sops or bounties to favored localities. They thought that foreign commerce was everything. They read of appropriations for streams with Indian or other names unknown to them, and at once they inferred that there was no merit in the appropriations for such
